

Peel pinx

Angus sculp

M. Tho PAINE.

Published as the Act directs , Sep 5791 by C. Forster N. 21 Poultry .

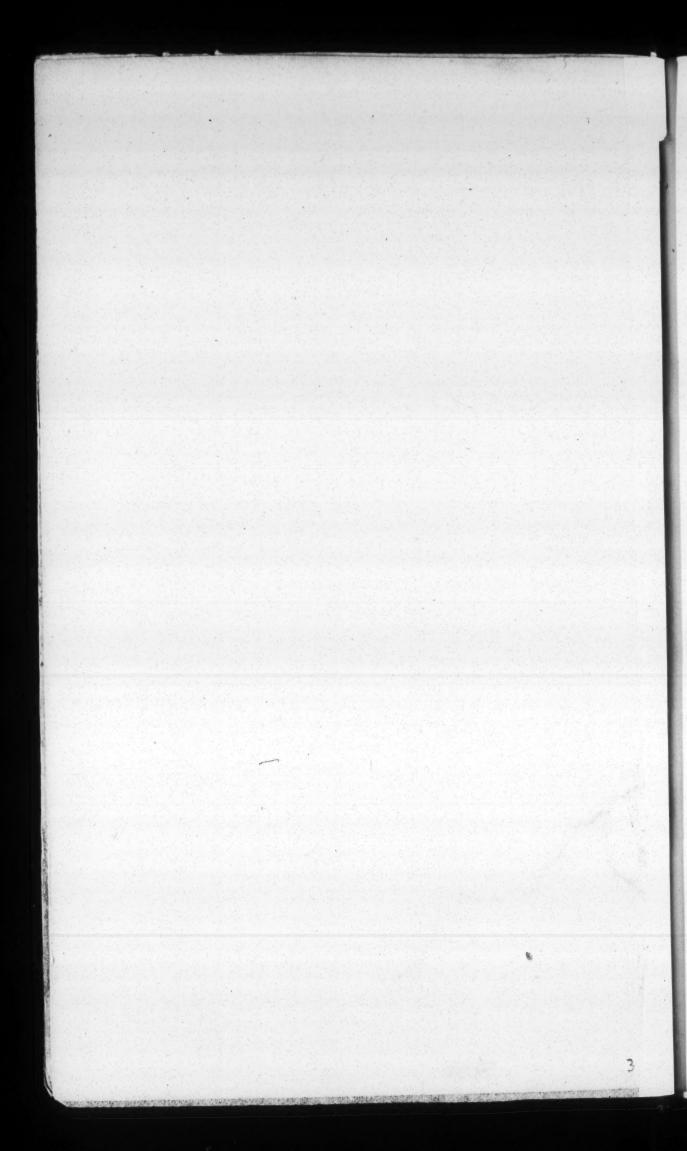

THE

L I F E

OF

THOMASPAIN.

[ Price Two Shillings and Sixpence, ]

LIFE

OF

THOMAS PAIN,

THE AUTHOR OF

RIGHTS OF MEN.

WITH

A DEFENCE OF HIS WRITINGS.

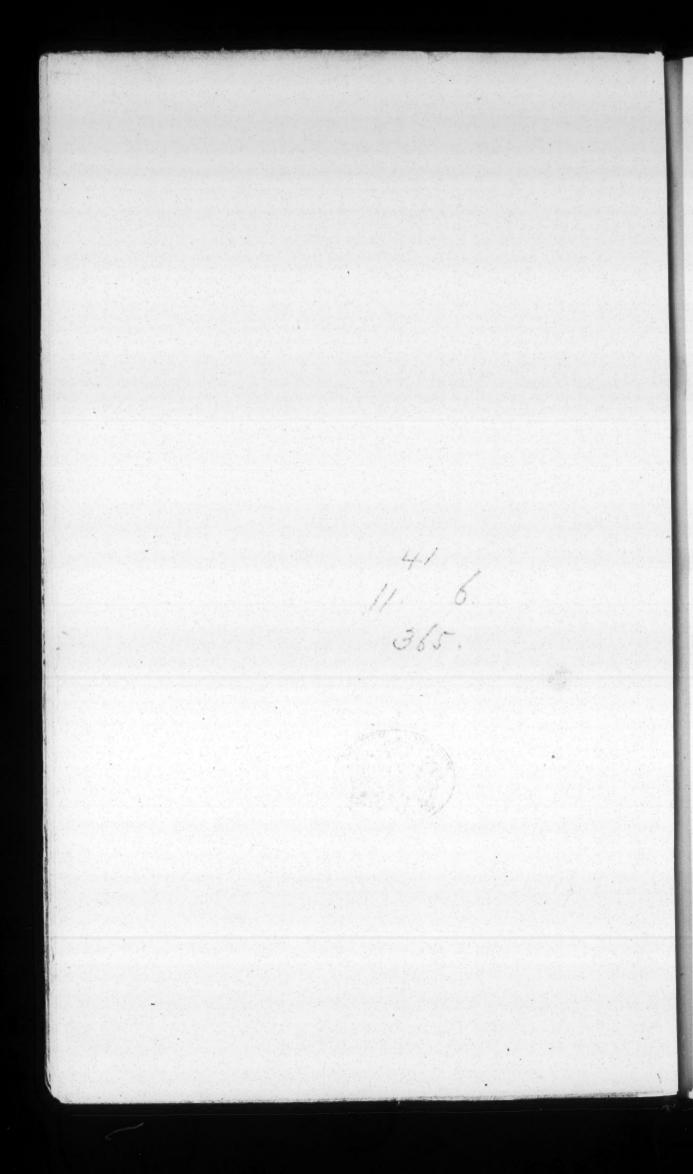

ВУ

FRANCIS OLDYS, A.M.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR JOHN STOCKDALF, PICCADILLY.

M DCC XCI.

LIFE

OF

THOMAS PAIN,

&c. 8cc. 8cc.

iterated fuffrage of mankind, that the lives of those persons, who have either performed useful actions, or neglected effential duties, ought to be recounted as much for an example to the present age, as for the instruction of future times.

Few men have more justly merited the honour of this notice, either as an B example example to be avoided at prefent, or as a leffon to be learned hereafter, than the personage, whose actions we are now to recount, and whose writings we are about to defend.

The borough of Thetford, in the county of Norfolk, has in the fame manner become dignified by the birth of Pain *, as the Rubicon was ennobled by the paffage of Cæfar. At Thetford he was born on the 29th of January, 1736-7. His father was Joseph Pain, the fon of a small but reputable farmer, a stay-maker by trade, and a Quaker in religion: His mother was Frances Cocke, the daughter of an attorney at Thetford, and of the established church.

Joseph

* Our author's real name is Pain: his fictitious name is Paine with a final e: For, his father's name was Pain; his own name was Pain, when he married, when he corresponded with the Excise, and when he first appeared in America: but, finding some inconvenience in his real name, or seeing some advantage in a sictitious one, he thus changed the name of his family; and he thus exercised a freedom, which only great men enjoy for homourable ends.

Joseph Pain was a reputable citizen, and, though poor, an honest man: Frances Cocke was a woman of a four temper and an eccentric character: and they were married in the parish of Euston, near Thetford, on the 20th of June, 1734 *. By thus taking his wife from the church, Joseph Pain was by his own act and the rules of the Quakers, at once expelled from their community. But, neither this irregularity, nor this expulsion, prevented that benevolent fect from pitying his distresses through life, and relieving his wants as they were feen. The father and mother both lived to know their fon's vices, to pity his misfortunes, to hear of his fame, but to partake little of his bounty t. It arose probably from

* See the register of the parish of Euston.

† Joseph Pain was buried at Thetford on the 14th of November, 1786, aged 78.—Frances Pain, widow, was buried on the 18th of May, 1789, recorded to be 94: but, as she was born in January 1697-8, the parish register makes her age to be greater than it was, though the had far outlived the period which is assigned to mortals.

the tenets of the father and the eccentricity of the mother, that our author was never baptized *, though he was privately named, and never received, like true Christians, into the bosom of any church, though he was indeed confirmed by the bishop of Norwich; owing to the orthodox zeal of Mistress Cocke, his aunt, a woman of such goodness, that though she lived on a small annuity, she imparted much of this little to his mother, while he neglected his aged parent, amidst his cares for mankind,

* As he was not baptized, the baptifin of Thomas Pain is not entered on the parish books of Thetford. It is a remarkable fact, that the leaves of the two registers of the parishes of St. Cuthbert's and St. Peter's, in Thetford, containing the marriages, births, and barrials, from the end of 1733, to the beginning of 1737, have been completely cut out. Thus a felony has been committed against the public, and an injury done to individuals, by a hand very malicious and wholly unknown. Whether our author, when he resided at Thetford in 1787, looked into these registers for his own birth; what he saw, or what he did, we will not conjecture. They contain the baptism of his sister Elizabeth, on the 28th of August, 1738.

Our author was educated at the freeschool of Thetford, under Mr. Knowles, who, whatever were his merits, is faid never to have rifen to be mafter. The expence of young Pain's education was defrayed, in fome measure, by his father, but chiefly by the relations of his mother. He was deemed a fharp boy, of unfettled application; but he left no performances which denote juvenile vigour, or uncommon attainments. His tuition was directed, by his expectations, to what is useful, more than to what is ornamental; to reading, writing, and cyphering, which are fo commodious to tradefinen rather than to classical knowledge, which is fo decorous in gentlemen. With fuch instruction, he left the fchool, at the age of thirteen, in order to learn his father's trade. The business of a staymaker he never liked, or indeed any occupation, which required attentive diligence and fleady effort. effort. He, however, worked, on with his father, fitting stays for the ladies of Thetford, during six years, except for a short while that he laboured with his cousin, in making bodices for the girls of Shipdam, in the county of Norfolk. But the had thus been educated, according to the recommendation of Mr. Locke; though a trade be better than house and land; yet the trade, and house, and land, are of no avail, if the person have not moral rectitude, and no heedful industry.

At the age of twenty, and in the year 1757, our author adventured to London, the common receptacle of the valiant and the wife, of the needy and the opulent, of the bufy and the idle. In this crowd, which confounds the greatest with the least, Pain cannot be distinguished. With whom he worked, or whom he fitted, tradition has not recounted. It is, however, certain, that London did not enjoy long the honour of his residence; no master was helped for many months by his journeywork; and few ladies had the happiness of being stayed by his skill-ful hand.

He was foon prompted by his restlessness, to look for new prospects at Dover, in 1758. For almost a twelvemonth our author worked with Mr. Grace, a respectable staymaker in that ancient cinque-port. Meantime, Miss Grace either won our author's heart, or our author attempted to win the heart of Miss Grace. And the father was thus induced to lend him twelve pounds, in order to enable our adventurer to set up as a master staymaker at Sandwich. Yet is it certain, that he neither married the lady, nor repaid the loan.

At Sandwich he fettled early in 1759. Biographers have been diligent to discover in what houses famous men had lived at particular periods of their depression, or their elevation. Of our author it can be only told, that he lodged in the market-place. The well known antiquary of this ancient port has not yet determined, whether he were not the first who had here used the mistery of stay-making. It is, however, certain, that he practifed other arts. There is a tradition, that in his lodging he collected a congregation, to whom he preached as an independent, or a methodist. While thus occupied, he became enamoured of the person, or the property, of Mary Lambert, the waits ing maid of the wife of Richard Solly, an eminent woollen draper at Sandwich. Mary Lambert, who is flill praifed by her own fex as a pretty girl of modest behaviour, our author married on the 27th of September, 1759 . She was the daughter of James Lambert, who, with his wife Mary, came to Sittingbourne, as an excifeman, * In the church register there is the following entry:

Thomas Pain, of the parish of St. Peter's, in the town of Sandwich, in Kent, bachelor, and Mary Lamciseman, some time before the year 1736; and who was soon after dismissed for missed who, and made greater gains by acting as bum-bailiss of Sittingbourne: yet he died in bad circumstances, on the 24th of May, 1753†; his wife dying about the same time, in a mad-house. The women of Sandwich, to this hour, express their surprise, that so sine a girl should have married so old a fellow: yet, Mary was scarcely twenty-one ‡; while Thomas was only twenty-two. The sact is, that our author has always appeared to bert of the same parish, spinster, were married in this church, by licence, this 27th day of Sept. 1759, by me WILLIAM BUNCE, Rector.

In the prefence of Thomas Taylor, Maria Solly, John Joslin.

THOMAS PAIN, MARY LAMBERT.

+ The Parish Register of Sittingbourne.

† Mary, the daughter of James and Mary Lambert, was baptized on the 1st of January, 1738. See the parish register of Sittingbourne.

C

female

female eyes a dozen years older than he was, owing to the hardness of his features, or to the scars of disease.

Marriage is the great epoch of a man's life. Our author was now to maintain his wife and family by his trade. The tradition of Sandwich Rill repeats, that he expected a fortune on his marriage, which he never found. In expectation there are doubtlefs degrees of comparison. A man beginming life, as a fray-maker, on twelve pounds of borrowed money, has other hopes and other fears, than men of vast wealth and unbounded expectancy. He certainly was disappointed both in his pleasure and his profit; and disappointment has a fad effect on the human constitution. Two months had hardly elapfed, when our author's ill usage of his wife became apparent to the whole town, and excited the indignation of some, with the pity of others. Influenced by the genuine goodness of the English character, Mrs. Solly relieved lieved the diffresses of her favourite maid with constant solicitude. For almost a twelvemonth this unhappy couple lived in comfortless lodgings. At length he took a house, without being able to furnish it. Mr. Rutter, a reputable broker of Sandwich, fupplied him with such furniture as he wanted. But it foon appeared that our author rather defired relief than wished for refidence. And being embarraffed with debts, and goaded by duns, he took the opportunity of the first Sunday morning to fail from Sandwich, with his wife and goods, to Margate; where he fold by auction the fame furniture, which Mr. Rutter had supplied him with on credit.

Our author, we fear, committed on this occasion an old crime, which has now a new name. In Henry VIIIth days, he who obtained another's property by false tokens, was punished, by pillory, as a cheat *. In George IId's

* By 23 Hen. VIII. ch. 1.

2 reign,

reign *, persons convicted of obtaining goods by false pretences, were to be transported, as fwindlers. What a fine opportunity for our metaphy fical statesmen to discuss, not so much our author's practice, as our author's principles. Had Thomas Pain been indicted at the Old Bailey, he might have infifted, as he now infifts, that the laws of England did not exist; and that the judges did not fit on the bench. The court would have been reduced to the dilemma of either fending him to Bedlam, or to Bridewell; or of proceeding with the trial; and adjudging the guilty culprit to the colonies, or the cart's tail. The before-mentioned metaphyficians would have perhaps exclaimed, that in force there is no argument. True: But, as philosophers, you do not furely difpute first principles; as logicians, you must not argue against facts. Whether the laws of Great Britain actually exist, is not a theory to be debated, but a fact to be acknowledged: and he who denies the existence of those objects, which with his senses he perceives, is not so much a declaimer to be confuted, as a madman to be confined, or a cheat to be corrected.

* By 30 Geo. II. ch. 24.

But, admitting, that facts cannot be debated, that first principles must not be denied, that ones own existence must not be doubted, yet our author might have pleaded what he now pleads, that fince the statute of Henry VIII. was made, before he was born, he ought not to be fent to the pillory under its provisions. Whether the court would have ordered the trial to proceed, of have stopped to argue a plea, which is not usually urged, must have depended on circumstances rather than on practice. You are are tried, good-nature might have faid, under rules, which having once been established by the Society, must remain in force till the same authority thall repeal them. Laws, as they they must equally apply to all persons, and must be uniformly executed at all times, cannot depend on circumstances fo fleeting in their nature, and fo unefficacious in their end, as the birth of fome perfons, and the death of others. If no criminals could be tried but those who drew their first breath fince the exiftence of the law, many would be unreftrained, while the few could alone be punished. If fociety be a bleffing, this bleffing could not be enjoyed, were the members of fociety to be in this manner opposed to each other; the guilty against the innocent; the proffigate against the virtuous; and the strong against the weak. As the culprit's plea firikes at the foundation of fociety, fociety must either relinquish its authority, or reject a plea, which is deftructive of itself. Thus every criminal, who denies the authority of those laws, that the fociety has enacted, and continues to enforce, puts himfelf in a state of warfare against the society, which is obliged obliged, by a regard to its own fecurity, to inform him of the fad alternative, either of fubmitting, or ceasing to exist.

Against the act of George II. for the punishment of fwindlers, our author might have infitted, as he still infifts, that though it was made fince he was born, he had not confented to be bound by its penalties. Those philofophers, the court might have faid, who resolve the fanction of laws into confent, must either argue against fact, and therefore argue illogically, or they must admit that this confent may be either virtual or express. Children, who are protected by fociety from the moment of their existence, are obliged to obey the rules of fociety, even before they arrive at fuch maturity of reason as to give their consent in the fmallest affairs. Strangers, who land upon our shore, virtually declare, by the act of their landing, that they are willing to obey the laws of the country. When Englishmen circumnavigate the globe, they virtually avow, wherever they may touch for refreshments or inquiry, that they are willing to conform to the cuftoms of the people whatever they may be. The most civilized citizen, who goes among the rudest savages, must profess peace, and practife obedience, or he would be treated as an enemy. Every man, therefore, who walks about among a people, avowing his disobedience to their laws, because he had not confeuted to their fanctions, declares himfelf to be in a state of warfare to all around him, like a favage in a wilderness. This last plea of our author, like his two former ones, must have been equally rejected by the court, as fuch an attack upon the existence of fociety, as makes fociety hostile to him.

During a disputations age, it would be an excellent question for metaphyfical disquisition, how much more good had had refulted to the world, had our author, when his peculiar pleas were thus rejected, been transported to the plantations at the public expence, in 1760, instead of transporting himself, at his own expence, in 1774. It might eafily be proved, without the arithmetical powers of Dr. Price, that our author's feven years fervitude would have expired in 1767. With his admirable pen he would have been just ready at that critical epoch to have brought forward all the bleffings of independence, at least seven years fooner. Great Britain would in the fame manner, and in the fame time, have equally partaken in the benefits of their independence. The French too would have feven years fooner enjoyed the felicity of fo bloodless a revolution, and fo tranquil a freedom. And last, but not least, the Constitutional Society would have feven years fooner poffest the heartfelt happiness, amidst the exhibaration of victuals and wine, of avowing their monarchical principles to an admiring world.

When our author had disposed of Mr. Rutter's goods at Margate, he once more mingled with the crowds of London. Of the fate of his wife, rumour has spoken variously. By some she is faid to have died on the road of ill ufage, and a premature birth. The women of Sandwich are politive, that the died in the British Lying-in Hospital, in Brownlow-fireet, Long-acre; but the register of this charity, which is kept with commendable accuracy, evinces, that the had not been received into this laudable refuge of female wretchednefs *. And there are others, who have convinced themselves by diligent enquiry, that the is still alive, though the extreme obscurity of her retreat prevents ready discovery. The trials which our author had made of his pleasure and little gain, induced him to renounce it at this time for ever. When a youth, he had inquired into the duty, and envied the perquisites, of an exciseman. His wife had, doubtless, spoken of the honours and emoluments of her father. And he was induced by these considerations in July, 1761, to seek for shelter in his father's house, that he might prosecute in quiet privacy the great object of his future course.

* A diligent fearch in the books of the Landon Lying-in Highlal in the City Road found no fuch person as Mistress Pointo have died in it, during the years 1760, or 1761.

After fourteen months of study and trials our author was established in the excise, in December, 1762, at the age of twenty-five. He owed this gratification of his wishes to the friendly interference of Mr. Cocksedge, the learned recorder of Thetford. He was soon sent as a supernumerary to gage the brewers of Grantham; and in August, 1764, he was employed to watch the sinugglers of Alford. Whether, while he thus walked at Grantham, or rode as an exciseman at Alford, his practices had been mifreprefented by malice, or his dishonesty had been detected by watchfulness, tradition has not told us: but, it is certain, that he was dismissed from his office, in August, 1765.

Our author, who appears to have had from nature no defire of accumulation, or rather no care of the future, was now reduced to extreme wretchednefs. He was abfolutely without food, without raiment, and without shelter. Bad, alas! must that man be who finds no friends in London. He met with perfons, who, from difinterested kindnefs, gave him clothes, money, and lodging. Thus he lived till the beginning of July, 1766, when he was restored to the excise. But mere restoration did not bring him present employment, or necessary supplies. And he was about the fame time obliged to enter into the fervice of Mr. Noble, who kept the great Academy in Lemonfireet, Goodman's-fields, at a falary of twenty pounds a year, with five pounds for fleeping out. Here he continued teaching teaching English, and walking out with the children, till Christmas, 1766, difliked by the mistress, who still remembers him, and hated by the boys, who were terrified by his harshness. Mr. Noble relinquished our author, without much regret, to Mr. Gardnor, who then taught a reputable school at Kenfington: yet, owing to whatever cause, he walked with Mr. Gardnor's scholars only the three first months of 1767. His defire of preaching now returned on him: but applying to his old mafter for a certificate to the bishop of London, of his qualifications, Mr. Noble told his former uther, that fince he was only an English scholar, he could not recommend him as a proper candidate for ordination in the church: vet our author determined to perfevere in his purpose, without regular orders. And he preached in Moorfields, and in various populous places in England, as he was urged by his necessities, or directed by his spirit. The text, which fo emphatically inculcates, meddle not with with them that are given to change, we may easily suppose he superficially explained, or feldom enforced.

The scene ere long shifted; and our author was at length to play an old part on a new theatre. In March, 1768, he was fent, after some delays, to be excise-officer at Lewes, in Suslex. He now went to lodge with Mr. Samuel Ollive, a tobacconift and shop-keeper of fair repute, in Lewes: but he feems to have learned no practical leffons from his recent removals and his former diffress. At the age of thirty-one he was rather ambitious to shine as a jolly fellow among his private companions, to whom, however, he exposed a temper, obstinate and overbearing, than to be confidered by his official superiors as an exciseman, remarkable for diligence and fidelity: and fuch were his enterprize on the water, and his intrepidity on the ice, that he became known by the characteriffic appellation of commodore. He lived on, suspected as an exciseman, and and unbeloved as a friend, with Samuel Ollive till his death, in July, 1769. This worthy tobacconist died rather in bad circumstances, leaving a widow, one daughter, and feveral fons, who have prospered as industrious citizens, and are respected as honest men. Our author, attempting to retain fome of the effects of the deceafed, was turned out of the house by Mr. Atterfol, the executor, with fuch circumflances as implied diffrust of his integrity. He found his way, however, into the house of Ollive, in 1770, by means of the widow and the daughter, who, doubtlefs, looked on him with other eyes. He opened ere long the shop, in his own name, as a grocer, and on his own behalf continued to work the tobaccomill of Ollive, however contrary both the shop and the mill were to the maxims of the excise. Such was his address, or his artifice, that though he had promoted the buying of fmuggled tobacco, he was able, for feveral years, to cover his practices, and to retain his protector.

The year 1771 forms one of the happy periods of his life. At the age of thirty-four he now married Elizabeth Ollive, the daughter of his old landlord, who was eleven years younger than himself *, and who was a woman of such personableness and purity, as to attract men of higher rank and greater delicacy. Pain had, however, gained her affections; and she would have him, contrary to the advice of Mr. Attersol, her father's friend, and the remonstrances of her own relations. This marriage began inauspiciously, and

By me, ROBERT AUSTEN, Curate,

(Signed)
THOMAS PAIN.
ELIZABETH OILIVE.
Witneffes,
HENRY VERSALL.
THOMAS OLLIVE.

* The following entry appears on the parish register of St. Michael, in Lewes — I homas Pain, batchelor, and Elizabeth Ollive, spinster, were married in this church by license, the 26th of March, 1771.

ended unhappily. Before our author could have obtained his marriage license, he fwore that he was a backelor, when he knew, that he was a widower, if indeed his first wife were deceased. As to the fanction of an oath, he had learned that commodious maxim of the celebrated moralift: 66 - That he who 66 made, and forced it, broke it; not 66 he, that for convenience took it." Our author was, on this occasion, in-Arumental too, with his understanding clear and his eyes open, in entering on the register that he was a backelor, though he knew he was a widower. Now, the statute*, yclept the Marriageact, which some confider as an infringement of mens rights and womens rights, declares it to be felony, without benefit of clergy, wilfully to make a false entry on the register, with intention to defeat the falutary purposes of recording truth, difcriminating characters, and afcertaining property. Yet, our author, however he may use other mens goods as his own, whatever he may think of the facredness of oaths, however he may regard the integrity of registers, can easily plead, that since he never consented to be bound by what the nation had solemnly enacted, he cannot be guilty; a doctrine which is convenient indeed to him, however injurious to the people, whose property and whose happiness are secured by fair dealing and honest practice; by the fanction of oaths, and the authenticity of records.

<sup>* 26</sup> Geo. II. ch. 33.

After these vicisitudes of fortune, and those varieties of same, our author commenced public writer in 1771. The electors of New Shoreham had lately shone with such uncommon lustre, as to attract parliamentary notice, and to incur parliamentary disfranchisement *. A new election was now to be held, not so much in a new manner, as on new principles. The poets of Lewes were called upon by Rumbold, the candidate of fair pretensions, to furnish an appropriate propriate fong. Our author obtained the laurel, with three guineas for his pains. It may, then, be doubted, whether it be strictly true, what he afferted, in his news-paper altercations, in-1779, that till the epoch of his Common Sense, he had never published a syllable.

" By 11 George III. ch. 55."

If the diffributing of printed papers be publication, it will foon appear, that our author had not been quite innocent of publishing, in England. He had rifen, by fuperior energy, more than by greater honesty, to be a chief among the excifemen. They had long feen, that whatever increase there had been in private wealth, or in public revenue, no increase came to them. Their allowance of one shilling and nine-pence farthing a day, which had been always little, was now made lefs, by the rife in the price of provisions, from the establishment of taxes, and the expansion of luxury. They thought themselves thut out from the general bleffing; which they beheld, faid our author, like a map of Peru. A defign was thus formed formed by the excise officers throughout the kingdom, to apply to Parliament for a confideration of the state of their falaries. A common contribution was made for the common benefit. And our author engaged to write their Cafe, which he produced, after many months labour, in 1772. This is an octavo pamphlet of twenty-one pages, which, exclusive of The Introduction, is divided into two heads; The State of the Salary of the Officers of Excise; Thoughts on the Corruption, arising from the Poverty of Excise Officers. On these topics he fays all that the ablest writer could have faid. Truth eafily flides into the mind without the affiftance of: ability, or the recommendations of artifice. But, if our author's maiden pamphlet be inspected by critical malignity, it will be found, like his maturer writings, to abound in the false grammar of illiterature, and the false thoughts of inexperience. Vigour of fentiment and energy of manner will not be denied him. His first pamphlet will will be confidered as his best performance by all those, who regard truth as superior to falsehood, modesty to impudence, and just complaint to factious innovation.

Four thousand of The Case were printed by Mr. William Lee of Lewes, in 1772. But even the copies, which were intended for the Members of Parliament, were not all diffributed. Our author on that occasion wrote a letter concerning the Nottingham officers, which was printed on a folio sheet; and to thefe he added another letter, enforcing his case, on a folio page. Yet, all these efforts ended in no application to Parliament, though our author buftled in London, through the winter of 1773. A rebellion of the excisemen, who seldom have the populace on their fide, was not much feared by their fuperiors. The excifemen could only reproach our author for receiving their money, without obtaining them redrefs. And of Pain, who employed him, the printer complains, that he has not yet been paid for printing, though much had been contributed and little had been spent. This is a memorable instance how easily men may be led on to complain of their present situation, without any other success, than making their subsequent condition worse than their first.

Those were not our author's only cares, who was foon to encounter other evils. With the year 1774 misfortunes crouded fast upon him. He is one of those characters, who, as they attend more to other men's affairs than their own, are frequently distinguished in the world by misfortune's fcars. His inattention to his shop, ere long left him without a shop to attend. culties foon brought on diffress; and diffress drove him to do what firict honefty did not abfolutely warrant. made a bill of fale of his whole effects to Mr. Whiffeld, a reputable grocer at Lewes, who was his principal creditor; and who, feeing no hope of payment from his constant irregularities, took possession of the premises, which he difdisposed of as his own, in April 1774 *. The other creditors, thinking themfelves outwitted by Whiffeld and cheated by Pain, let loofe the terriers of the law upon him. Like other hunted animals, our author run for refuge to the Whitehart-inn, in the cock-loft of which he lay, without bedding, and but for the female fervant, had been without food, till Sunday fet him free. Alas! how often do men enjoy the greatest benefits from the institutions of religion and the rules of fociety, without reflecting, that in the first alone is their hope, in the fecond only is their fafety!

* Mr. Whiffeld, by publishing the following advertisement, exposed to the whole town of Lewes, the desperate state of his debtor's circumstances: "To be fold by auction, on Thursday the 14th of April, and

" following day, all the household furniture, stock in " trade, and other effects, of Thomas Pain, grocer and " tobacconist, near the West Gate, in Lewes: Also, a " horse-tobacco and snuff-mill, with all the utenfils for cutting of tobacco and grinding of fnuff; and two un-

" opened crates of cream-coloured ftone ware."

Troubles feldom come alone. He had long been known at Lewes as an officer, inattentive, if not unfaithful. He had fometimes condescended, for the purpose of concealment, to drink a bottle with the examiner *. But, the eagle-eyes of the excise were not to be blinded by bottles. With the watchfulness, and jealousy, and acuteness, which make the excise the cleanest collector at the smallest rate, his superiors had for some time beheld him dealing as a grocer in exciseable articles, as a grinder of snuff, buying smuggled tobacco; at others conniving, * As every scrap of a great writer is interesting to the curious, we have preserved the subjoined extract of a letter from our author to a superior excise officer, dated at Lewes, the 24th of March, 1774:

&quot; Dear Sir,

&quot; I have requested Mr. Scott to put ye 3d and 4th

&quot; rd. books for 74 under examination, for as I was in

&quot; London almost all last winter, I have no other, which &quot; have any business in them-Request the favour (if &quot; not too inconvenient) to inquire and inform me when

&quot; they are ordered—and if you can find out the examiner, desire you will drink a bottle or two of wine with him-

&quot; I should like the character to go in as fair as it can."

not

in order to conceal himself. He was therefore dismissed from the excise, after a dozen years service, in April 1774. He petitioned for restoration: but, such was his notoriousness, that his patron was unable to protect him.

What had been feen at Sandwich of his conjugal tyranny, was ere long obferved at Lewes. Such was the meekness of his wife that she suffered patiently: but as his embarraffments did not mollify a temper, which is from nature harsh; as his subordination to others did not foften his treatment of inferiors, from neglect of his wife, he proceeded to contumely; from contumely he went on to cruelty; when, being no longer able to support his repeated beatings, she complained to her friends. She, at length, told, that at the end of three and a half year's cohabitation, their marriage had never been confummated. It now became a question among the men, and among the women of Lewes, what could be the cause, that in so long a period, he had not performed the promife, which is fo emphatically enforced in the connubial ceremony; whether it could be owing to natural imbecility, or to philosophical indifference. In the midft of this difquifition, our author had the dignity, or the meannefs to fubmit to the inspection of the faculty; and Mr. Manning, a very skilful furgeon of Lewes, reported, that he faw apparent ability. Our author faid himfelf, "that " he married for prudential reasons, " and abstained for prudential reasons." Alas! are the rights of men, the boaft of the new philosophy, to subfift thus in personal convenience, which difregards folemn engagements, and contemns the rights of others! On the 24th of May, 1774, Pain and his wife entered into articles of separation, which were skilfully drawn by Mr. Jofiah Smith, a most respectable attorney of Lewes; she engaging to pay her hufband thirty-five pounds; and he promifing to claim no part of whatever goods fhe might gain in future.

1

Our author immediately hid himfelf in the obscurities of London. But though he was unfeen, he was not inactive; he contrived to discover his wife's retreat in the house of her benevolent brother, who though he had disapproved her marriage, now sheltered her diftress. The husband found no difficulty in disquieting the wife's repose. He disputed the articles of separation, which he had recently executed with fuch folemnity. The occasion gave rife to a question among the civilians, who are most conversant in matrimonial matters, whether this marriage were not void, ab initio. They thought clearly, that natural imbecility had annulled the connubial tie; but they doubted, whether malicious impotence amounted to habitual deficiency, though it was doubtlefs a fufficient cause for a divorce, a menso et thoro. The common lawyers, who confider marriage merely as a contract, held the bad faith of the husband, in refusing to perform what he had folemnly flipu-F 2 lated,

9

r

e

er

11

lated, to have absolutely vitiated the original agreement. Amidst these doubts and difficulties, on the 4th of June, 1774, the husband and wife entered into new articles of separation, which amounted to a declaration on his part, that he no longer found a wife a convenience; and on her part, that she had too long suffered the miseries of such a husband.

Neither the bankruptcy, nor difmiffal from office, nor feparation from his wife, weakened our author's interest with the late George Lewis Scott, who had been appointed a commissioner of excise in 1758; and who, having been first attracted by the case of the excisemen, was afterwards captivated by the foftness of his manner, which concealed the harshness of his spirit. When his patron, whose literature is remembered, while his benevolence is forgotten, could not, for the third time, obtain our author's restoration as an officer of excife, he recommended him strongly to that great man Dr. Benjamin Franklin,

fin, as a person who could, at that epoch, be useful in America. The Doctor having recently felt the mortification of difmiffal himfelf, was fupposed to be a man who was foftened by his fuffering. But the Doctor's heart was now contracted by age. His knowledge of political life made him confider confidence as the virtue of infancy; and he was displeased with his old acquaintance, for recommending fuch a character to his notice. Our author had, however, refolved to renounce his country, fince his country had so often frowned on him: and in September, 1774, he fet fail for America, where tumult reigned triumphant; where the bufy might then find employment, and the idle affociates; the bafe concealment, and the brave applause.

Meantime, rumour carried to our author's mother, representations of his latter life, which were probably exaggerated by enmity, or mistated by malice. She certainly felt, that a child's ingratitude is sharper than a serpent's tooth.

tooth. She was almost distracted by her apprehensions and her feelings; and she regretted with a woman's sympathy, that the wife, whose character had desied inquiry, and whose amiableness deserved esteem, should be tied for life to the worst of husbands *.

Our

" tender

* We subjoin the following letter from our author's mother to his wife; not only for its own merit, but because it ascertains his identity and illustrates his character:

Thetford, Norfolk, 27th July, 1774.

" Dear Daughter, " I must beg leave to trouble you with my enquiries concerning my unhappy fon and your husband: various are the reports, the which I find come originally from " the Excise-office. Such as his vile treatment to you, " his fecreting upwards of 301. intrusted with him to " manage the petition for advance of falary; and that " fince his discharge, he have petitioned to be restored, which was rejected with fcorn. Since which I am told " he have left England. To all which I beg you'll be kind enough to answer me by due course of post. "You'll not be a little furprized at my fo strongly de-" firing to know what's become of him after I repeat to " you his undutiful behaviour to the tenderest of parents; he never asked of us any thing, but what was granted, "that were in our poor abilities to do; nay even diftreffed ourselves, whose works are given over by old " age, to let him have 201. on bond, and every other

Our author happily arrived at Philadelphia in winter, 1774, a few months, as he recounts himfelf, before the battle of Lexington, in April, 1775*. His first employment, in the new world, was shopman to Mr. Aitkin, a very industrious bookseller, in Philadelphia, at twenty pounds a year. He, who was born to illuminate the western hemisphere by his wifdom, was for fome months engaged in retailing politics by the pennyworth, and carrying parcels by the dozen. It shews the strength of his character, and the vigour of his powers, that he should have speedily rifen from the shopman to the statef-

&quot; tender mark a parent could possibly shew a child; his

&quot; ingratitude, or rather want of duty, has been fuch, that

&quot; he have not wrote to me upwards of two years.-If

&quot; the above account be true, I am heartily forry, that a woman whose character and amiableness, deserves the &quot; greatest respect, love, and esteem, as I have always &quot; on enquiry been informed yours did, should be tied for &quot; life to the worst of husbands .- I am, dear daughter, so your affectionate mother,

&quot;F. PAIN."

&quot;P. S. For God's fake, let me have your answer, as I am almost distracted."

* Al. Rememb. 1778-9, pag. 319.

man; from being the distributer of stationary, to be the dismemberer of provinces.

From the shop he started to the laboratory, in November 1775, in order to furnish the Congress with saltpetre, when foreign fupplies were stopped, and domestic resources were doubtful. He now employed his fertile genius in making experiments for the purpose of fixing on fome eafy, cheap, and expeditious method of making faltpetre. proposed the plan of a faltpetre affociation, for voluntarily fupplying the public magazines with gunpowder *. thus evinced to the approving Congress, that he could furnish other instruments of independence than the pen. vember 1775 was an anxious moment, when every hand was bufy, and Pain ran about among the Philadelphians, like a giant among pigmies.

The great, the important day, was now arrived, when our author was to dispel the louring clouds by bis refulgence, to illuminate the new world by bis fun, to invigorate by bis brighter beams, and to direct by bis fuperior lustre. On the 10th of January, 1776, was published Common Sense, an octavo pamphlet of three and fixty pages *. This disquisition opens with a political discovery, which had escaped the fagacity of Sydney, and eluded the understanding of Locke: " That fociety and government are not only different, but have different origins; that fociety is a good, and government an evil." This fundamental dogma was not received without remarks, or heard without an answer. Society, it was faid, is the union of man for the fafety of individuals; bappiness is the end of this union; and government is the means for * In the Pennfylvania Journal, dated the 10th of January, 1776, there is the following advertisement: "This day was published, and is now felling by Robert Bell, in Third-street, [Philadelphia,] price two shillings, "Common Sense, addressed to the inhabitants of North America." This fixes the date of the publication, which historians have mistaken.

* Pennfyl. Journal, Nov. 22d. 1775.

the attainment of this end: Now, if you remove the means, either in practice, or in argument, you at the same time destroy the end; and if you defeat the end, you thereby diffolve the union. Government and fociety being thus parts of one whole, and being thus directed to the same end, have the fame origin, and cannot without each other exist. In this manner, then, is your Common Sense plainly converted into Non-sense. It was Cato *, our author's most formidable antagonist, who argued thus with all the fententioufness and authority of his great precurfor of the Roman state. But CATO did not fufficiently attend to our author's purpose; who intended more to mifrepresent than to reason; more to deceive than to convince: and his defign led him naturally to separate fociety from government, and to declare fociety to be always a good, but government even of the best form to be every where an evil: he could not have meant what he certainly said *, because the unqualified affertion is inconsistent with Common Sense; but he must have intended no more than that good government is only an evil to evil-doers.

* CATO was William Smith, D. D. the prefident of the college of Philadelphia, who was countenanced and affifted by some of the ablest members of the first Congress. He was a veteran writer of established practice.

Whatever may be the value of this fundamental dogma in theory, or its use in practice, it was afterwards stolen by the Abbé Raynal, one of the metaphysical statesmen of the age, who writes history, as men take cathartics, for discharging crudities and for the pleasure of evacuation to the Abbé appears to have been so delighted, when he found it, that he did not consider the immorality of appropriating as his own what belonged to another: perhaps he regarded it as one of the rights of men, to adopt kindly what he saw flruggling for reception into the republic of letters. Our author however reclaimed his goods, and by plain collation proved his property *, and convicted the culprit. Yet, as there are men who doubt their own existence, so were there sceptics who disputed, whether this dogma were a discovery of Raynal or of Pain. The doubtists produced a passage from an eminent lawyer of the last century, who wrote with the precision of prose, yet with the neatness of poetry:

* In p. 1, and through the whole section, which treats of the Origin and Design of Government.

+ In the Revolution of America, by Abbe Raynal, p. 33.

- " --- Broken laws are ne'er the worfe;
- " Nay, till they're broken have no force.
- " What's Justice to a man, or Laws,
- " That never comes within their claws?
- "They have no power but to admonish,
- " Cannot controul, coerce, or punish,
- " Until they're broken; and then touch
- " Those only that do make them such."

Whether Cato disdained to pull down the superstructure after he had destroyed the foundation, may be inferred, but cannot be discovered. He certainly infifted through feveral papers *, that he who treats the best government as an evil may be allowed to affert, " that the constitution of England, be-" ing an union of three powers reci-" procally checking each other, is far-" cical;" that he who pronounces, " that no power which needs checking " can be from God +," may be permit-" ted to tell how " government by " kings is the most prosperous in-" vention the devil ever fat on foot for " the promotion of idolatry;" that he whose purpose is to please the low, may eafily infult the high; he who feldom reasons may often rail; and he whose defign is to diffolve fociety may practife any means. All this our author did not hear patiently. ftay-maker attacked the fcholar through the fame channel, under the title of A Forrester t. The onset was furious,

* By his Letter to Abbe Raynal, p. 58, &c.

* In the Pennsylvania Journal. + Page 8.

† In the Pennsylvania Journal, the first Forrester was published on the third of April, 1776; and the fourth Essay, which was the last, appeared on the 8th of May, 1776.

and the victory doubtful. The staymaker had most popularity; the scholar had most knowledge; the sirst had most smartness; the last had most strength: our author's art consisted in assumption of premises, and sophistry of deduction; Cato's power lay in solidity of principle, and justness of reasoning: the exciseman, for once, had the applause of the mob; the president of the college was approved by the young who read, and by the old who thought *.

Yet

* The scholar was studious to expose the stay-maker as an illiterate writer: his false grammar thus:- " Many circumstances bath, and will arise." [Introd.] "Here is the origin and rife of government." [P. 4.] " Abfolute governments bath this advantage." [P. 5.] " That the Commons is a check upon the king." [P. 6.]-Whom it has always supposed wifer than him. A mere absurdity!" [P. 7.] His improprieties thus:-"William, the Conqueror, was a usurper." [P. 20.]-" a union." [P. 25.]—After thus shewing false grammar and false idiom, nonsensicalness [25-26] and coarfeness [every where], the scholar exclaimed; That it would degrade criticism to chase a child to his hornbook. But, the prefident of the college hould have remembered, that claffical writing was not to be expected from

Yet it cannot be denied that common fense was universally perused, and loudly praised. For the minds of the Colonists had been prepared by the previous publication of Burgh's Disquisitions; and by the essays of similar writers;

" Who fancy every thing that is,

" For want of mending, much amifs."

Whatever is received, faid the fapience of Johnson, is received in proportion to the recipient. The planters had long withed the doctrines of common fense to be true; and they thought the author infallible: they had, for years, been travelling on the road of independence; and Pain shewed them the shortest way. The first edition was quickly fold. A second, with a supplement of one-third more, was immediately prepared. A German translation was printed to Bell, the book-from a mere stay-maker, a mere grocer, a mere exciseman; but that he is the true crater, who gains his end by affecting, and convincing. It was the first American edition of Common Sense, which the scholar quoted against the stay-maker.

† Pennsyl. Journ. 31 Jan. 1776.

feller, was changed, according to our author's uniformity of acting, for Bradford, the printer: yet, after all these editions, and all this applause, this wonder-working pamphlet brought the writer of it in debt to the publisher  $£29:12:1\frac{1}{2}$ , as he has told, who best knew \*.

But who wrote it was the wonder. It must be Adams, said the Bostonians; it must be Franklin, said the Philadelphians; it must be Washington, said the Virginians. Many months had not elapsed, when our author claimed his profit and his praise. Neither was this profit much diminished, nor this praise much prevented by the Answer, entitled Plain Truth, which, as it was hastily written, was inattentively read; and, as it only taught the dull duty of obedience, was not much heared amidst the ravings of anarchy.

Common Sense was then written to support the Congress; but the Congress

* See Pain's Declaration in Almon's Rem. 1780, Part I. p. 295.

after-afterwards confuted Common Sense. After feven years experience, they ingratefully determined *, notwithstanding our author's capital dogma, that anarchy is an evil to be avoided, and government a good to be cherished; that sovereignty and fubordination, being contradictory qualities, cannot both exist in the fame focieties, or in the fame perfons; that the individuals, who compose any political union, cannot be fafe, if they be not restrained; that where happiness is the end of a people, much must be facrificed to the means whereby this end can alone be fecured. In this strain it was, that the wonderful wife man, General Washington, wrote the following paragraph, when he announced the final determinations of the united wisdom of the New World †:-

* In the convention, which was held at Philadelphia, in September 1787; and which fettled the prefent conftitution of the United States.

† It was part of the letter which he wrote on the 17th of September, 1787, as president of the grand convention, when he communicated to congress the establishment of a new constitution on new principles.

" It is obviously impracticable in the " federal government of these states, " to fecure all the rights of indepen-" dent fovereignty to each, and yet " provide for the interest and safety of " all. Individuals, entering into fo-" ciety, must give up a share of liber-"ty to preferve the reft. The mag-" nitude of the facrifice must depend " as well on fituation and circum-" flance, as on the object to be ob-" tained." These must be allowed to be excellent observations, though they be not altogether new. All these and more are taught to every Englishman in his nurfery, except, indeed, those Englishmen, who are educated at Ge-

The times that tried men's fouls (as our author has it) were, in America, the year 1776. When all was done that the pen could do, the fword was drawn. But, the first onset was unfavourable to the American arms. The troops of Congress were expelled from Canada neva and Laufanne, at Warrington and Hackney.

Canada in June. They were defeated on Long-Island in August. They evacuated New York in September. They fled from the White Plains in October. and Fort Washington (a happy name) though garrifoned by three thousand patriots, was taken by storm on the 16th of November. In the midst of these defeats, our author was prompted by his courage, or his zeal, to join the army: but, whether to counfel, to command, or to obey, curiofity could not difcover amid the din of war. It is only certain, that he accompanied the retreat of Washington from Hudfon's River to the Delaware. Like Xenophon our author faw, and has recorded * the events of this famous march, which may be likened to the celebrated retreat of the ten thousand. When Washington had croffed the Delaware, he might have exclaimed with Francis, all is loft, but our bonour. The * In The CRISIS, No I.—There is a journal of this retreat in Al. Rem. 1777, p. 28, which was plainly written by Pain.

Congress fled. All was dismay. fo our author: he publicly thanked God, that he did not fear: he faw no cause for fear. He knew well their fituation, and faw his way out of it. He endeavoured, with no inconfiderable fuccess, to make others see with his eyes, to inspire others with his confidence. It was with this defign that he published in the Pennsylvania Journal, on the 19th of December 1776, The Crisis *, wherein he states every topic of hope, and examines every motive of apprehension. This Estay he continued to publish periodically, during the continuance of hostilities, as often as the necessity of affairs required, that he should conceal truth, or propagate falshood; that he should exhilarate dependency, or reprefs hope t.

* Alm. Rem. 1777, p. 11.

† The Criss, N° XIII. was published at Philadelphia the 19th of April, 1783, the same day that a cessation of hostilities was proclaimed. This was the last. [Alm. Rem. 1783, Part II. p. 105.]

In the midst of those defeats and of that difmay, the Congress dispatched agents to foreign powers to folicit warlike stores, and to engage experienced officers. Deane, Franklin, and Arthur Lee, met together at Paris, in December 1776, where they excited fympathy, whatever relief they obtained. Our author did more real fervice, by publishing another Crisis on the 13th of January 1777 *, whereby he tried with wonderful fuccess to inspire confidence in their own abilities, and to infuse contempt of their opponent's negotiation and arms. The year 1777 was to the Congress a period of alternate elation and depression, but of final triumph. At first, its European concerns were managed by a Committee for secret Correspondence: but, as its demands for European aid became more urgent, the Secret Committee was converted into the Committee for foreign

* Alm. Rem. 1777, p. 16. Pain published his third Criss on the 13th of April. [ib. 313.] His fourth Criss on the 12th of September. [ib. 437.]

Affairs. Of this Committee our author was now appointed Secretary, as an approbation of his writings, and as a reward of his labours. All letters, that were officially written by Congress, after this epoch, went from his office: the political epiftles of Congress rested afterwards in his hands *. From that notable æra of his honours, our author enjoyed the correspondence, though not the confidence of Franklin, who we may remember, rejected him as a bad character, in 1774; and who perhaps did not confider his morals as much mended, even in 1777 †.

Our author's office required him in future to reside with Congress, who, wheresoever it sled, or howsoever it were situated, deserved the praise of steady sirmness. The success which was the refult of this magnanimity, did not however prevent interestedness, or defeat cabal. In December, 1777, Silas Deane, the first and ablest commercial agent of Congress in Europe, was recalled, to make room for William Lee, the well known Alderman of London. Deane arrived on board the French fleet in July, 1778. The Sieur Gerard was publickly received by Congress, on the fixth of the subsequent August. In this manner was intrigue transferred to Philadelphia from Paris. Deane was twice heard by the Congress, on the 9th and 21ft of August, in order to explain, what he had been recalled to elucidate, the Congress affairs in the European world. Whatever may have been the cause, whether ungracefulness of manner, or infusficiency of matter, certain it is, that the Congress would not hear Deane a third time, though entreated by every mode of application. On this subject, and on this occasion, he appealed to the free and virtuous virtuous citizens of America *, on the 5th of December, 1778, professing great respect for the Congress, but disclosing to the country, that a facrifice had been made of patriotism to cabal of family. The many who faw two brothers of the Virginia Lees in the Congress, and another brother ambaffador at Vienna, and a fourth brother at Berlin, feared for popular rights from ariftocratical prevalence. The few regretted, that patriots were at all times, and in every place, the fame. Richard Henry Lee, the most elequent and the most leading member of the Congress, addressed his countrymen to suspend their decision against his family, till the charges should be properly investigated. And Deane declared, in December 1778, that fince the Congrefs were at length disposed to listen to his plaints, he had now no occasion for the mediation of the people *.

* Pain's Letter to Raynal, p. 29.

+ Alm. Rememb. 1778-9, p. 319.

‡ During the winter 1777, and the spring following, the congress was assembled at York-Town, in Pennsylvania. [Pain's Letter to Raynal, p. 26.] The congress returned to Philadelphia on its evacuation in June, 1778.

* This paper of Silas Deane contains much interesting anecdote, which makes it not unworthy of the historian's notice. [Alm. Rem. 1778-9, p. 185.]

Of those events, and of that altercation, which thus interested the American world, our author was no unconcerned spectator. He published his fifth Crisis on the 10th of June 1778 †; his fixth Crisis in October, and his feventh in November thereafter 1. At the fame moment that Deane laid down the pen, our author took up his. Without confulting his prudence, he attacked Deane, who, as a fcholar, was fuperior to himfelf, as a statesman, had held higher offices; as an individual, was at least his equal. Without listening to Common Sense, he involved Robert Morris, the farfamed financier of the United States, who stepped from the floor of office, to to correct his mifreprefentations and repress his infolence §. Without con-

* See Alm. Rem. 1788-9, p. 185-190.

† Ibid. 1788, p. 340.

‡ Ibid. 1779, p. 304.—1780, p. 317.

§ Ibid. 1778-9, p. 382.

fidering official decorum, our fecretary retailed through the Newspapers, what he confidentally knew from the foreign correspondence. The Sieur Gerard, who had been bred at the foot of Vergennes, was fcandalized at an imprudent infidelity, which disclosed the intrigues of his court. Of this misconduct the minister of France complained to the Congress *. On the fixth of January 1779, being ordered to attend the Congress, our author was asked by Jay, the prefident, If he were the author of the publications on Mr. Deane's affairs; and answering Yes, he was ordered to withdraw. On the fubfequent day he applied to Congress for an explanatory hearing; but on motion he was refused; the Congress no doubt confidering, that the public officer, who had thus acknowledged his breach of trust, could not by any explanation, reestablish his official credit. Our author was thus forced to give in his refignation of the office of Secretary to the Committee for Foreign Affairs, on the 8th of January, 1779. Yer, strange to tell, on the 16th of the same month, a motion was made in Congress, for difmiffing him from the office that he no longer held: And, though there were fourteen members for it, to thirteen against it, the motion was lost; there being a tye upon the States, who alone could vote, of five to five *. On this event, our oufted Secretary made a political difcovery to the American Citizens, which they knew not before, That the sovereignty of the United States, and the delegated representation of that sovereignty in Congress, were two distinet things; which ought to be kept separate; and which proves, that the first may be rising, while the second is sinking.

* See Alm. Rem. 1778-9, from p. 374 to 391.— Ibid. 1780, p. 290—397.

* See those memorable incidents in our author's life told by himself, in the Pennsylvania Packet of the 13th of April, 1779.

Our author, however, did not repose in infignificance, when he ceased to be the fecretary of a committee. He continued to buftle awhile; to boaft of his fervices; and to complain of ingratitude. The Sieur Gerard thought him important, or perhaps imagined, that he whose infidelity had disclosed many fecrets, might, by refentment, be induced to reveal still more. Vergennes, the Plenipo had learned, that a point is to be carried by any means; by the faireft, if possible; by the foulest, if necessary. While Gerard complained to the Congress publickly, he intrigued with our author privately. They had feveral meetings, the object of which was Silence about Deane. Gerard made him a genteel and profitable offer. But our author was pledged to profecute Deane; and he was determined, that pension and Pain should never be seen together in the fame paragraph. Gerard renewed his intrigues with Pain: Pain conforted with Gerard: Gerard wished for opportunites portunities of shewing Pain more folid marks of bis friendsbip. Pain professed, that Gerard's esteem should be the only recompence. Thus a pension was offered, which was only declined; and a bribe was given, though it was not accepted *. The American world soon grew tired of pertness and recrimination, when it appeared, that against Deane nothing could be proved.

Our author's head being thus shorn of its political honours, was ere long crowned with academic laurels. He was

* See those intrigues detailed by Pain himself, with little prudence and no forecast, in Alm. Rem. 1780, Part I. p. 294—97. The following public papers will supply what is desective in Pain's detail;

&quot;SIR, Philadelphia, Jan. 13, 1779.

&quot;It is with real fatisfaction, that I execute the order of Congress for transmitting to you the inclosed copy of an act of the 12th instant, on a subject rendered important by affecting the dignity of Congress, the honour of their great ally, and the interest of both nations.

&quot;The explicit disavowal and high disapprobation of Congress, relative to the publications referred to in this act, will, I flatter myself, be no less satisfactory to his most christian majesty, than pleasing to the people of these states. Nor have I the least doubt but that every attempt was made master of arts by the univerfity of Pennsylvania, after the tumult of to injure the reputation of either, or impair their mutual confidence, will meet with the indignation and refentment of both.

" I have the honour, &c.

"To the Hon. the Sieur Gerard, Minister Plenipotentiary of France.

"JOHN JAY."

rifed

In Congress, January 12, 1779. " Congress resumed the consideration of the publications in the Pennsylvania Packet of 2d and 5th instant, under the title of Common Sense to the Public, on Mr. Deane's affair, of which Mr. Thomas Pain, Secretary to the Committee for foreign affairs, has acknowledged himfelf to be the author; and also the memorials of the Minister Plenipotentiary of France of the 5th and 10th infant, respecting the said publications; whereupon, Refolved unanimously, That in answer to the memorials of the Hon. Sieur Gerard, Minister Plenipotentiary of his Most Christian Majesty, of the 5th and 10th instant, the President be directed to assure the said Minister, that Congress do fully, and in the clearest and most explicit manner, disavow the publications referred to in the said memorials; and as they are convinced by indifputable evidence, that the supplies shipped in the Amphitrite, Seine, and Mercury, were not a present, and that his Most Christian Majesty, the great and generous ally of these United States, did not preface his alliance with any supplies whatever fent to America, fo they have not authoof the times had driven his old antagonist, the president, away. He was chosen a member of the American philosophical society, when it was revived rifed the writer of the faid publications to make any fuch affertions as are contained therein; but on the contrary, do highly disapprove of the same."

To which Mr. Gerard returned the following answer:

"SIR, Philadelphia, Jan. 14, 1779.

"I have received the letter with which you honoured me on the 13th instant, inclosing me the Resolve of Congress in answer to the representations I had the honour to make them on the 5th and 10th.

"I intreat you to receive and to express to Congress, the great sensibility with which I selt their frank, noble, and categorical manner of destroying those false and dangerous infinuations, which might mislead ignorant people, and put arms into the hands of the common enemy.

"To the King, my Master, Sir, no proofs are necessary to the foundation of a confidence in the firm and constant adherence of Congress to the principles of the alliance; but his Majesty will always behold with pleasure the measures which Congress may take to preserve inviolate its reputation; and it is from the same consideration, I statter myself, he will find my representations on the 7th of December equally worth his consideration.

" I am, &c.

"GERARD."

66 Published by order of Congress .

CHARLES THOMSON, Sec."

by the Pennfylvania legislature, in 1780; and when our author had himfelf the satisfaction of signing the act of revival, as clerk of the general assembly. He had the comfort of knowing, that though he had made enemies by his petulance, he had gained friends by his patriotism. And when the Congress had rejected him, as unworthy of trust, the assembly of Pennsylvania, being purged of Quakers by his pen, thought him sit for its clerk.

But though the Congress had wholly rejected our author, he did not totally reject the Congress; yet all that he could write, or others could do, did not prevent the bankruptcy of Congress, in March, 1780, when the Congress paper ceased to circulate. He gave the American citizens, soon after, A Criss Extraordinary*. He now recalled to their remembrance the original principles on which they had resisted: he endeavoured to convince them of their direct advantage in defending the country: he compared the resources of the contending parties; leaving the balance, by an easy calculation, in favour of his friends: and he laid before them a glowing picture, containing every motive which could cheer the hearts, or engage the honour of a patriot people; which could make them feel the line of their interest to be the line of their bappiness.

* Alm. Rem. 1781. part 1. pag. 131.

But their ears were callous to the voice of the charmer. The pen had, however, ceased to influence, during the clamour of contention, the intrigues of cabal, and the diffresses of war. While the American citizens denied supplies to the cries of Congress, they fullenly determined, to fuffer the miseries of hostility, till the acknowledgement of independence should make them happy. Our author cheered them from time to time with another Crisis, till his Crisis, becoming common, was no longer a Crisis; and was, therefore, read without attention, and K thrown thrown away without efficacy *. Hoftilities seemed to cease of themselves, in 1782, when mere weariness of paying alternately for victory and defeat, prompted the belligerent powers to ask each other, Why are we at war?

The Abbé Raynal haftened to give his history of the Revolution of America even before it was really atchieved t. Of the crudities which the fedentary Abbé had been collecting for vears, he now made a copious difcharge. A bilious mixture, he exhibited, of truth and falsehood, of sense and nonfense, of folly and philosophy. This galimafree, the academy of Lions received with applause. The English world were too bufy with their contests, their taxes, and repentance, to listen, without apathy, to a tale more worthy of attention. The American citizens heard the Abbé with difgust rather than disapprobation. But it was his facts more than his falfities, his independence more than his fervility, which gave them offence: he had afferted*, that none of the energetic causes, which had produced so many revolutions, existed among them; neither religion nor laws had been outraged; the blood of no martyr or patriot had streamed from their fcaffolds. He does not praife them as men, who fought like heroes, after they had drawn their fwords without real provocation †. And above all, he had on false pretences obtained our author's metaphysics, and fold them as his own; thus borrowing our author's moral with his maxims.

* Pennsyl. Gazette, 22d May, 1782. Alm. Rem. 1782. pag. 183.

<sup>1</sup> It was published at London, in December, 1781.

In August, 1782, our author reclaimed his property, by a letter to the Abbe Raynal on the affairs of North America ‡. As the plagiarism of the Abbé was obvious, it was easy to convict him; but where he had entrenched him-himself in facts, it was more difficult to dislodge him. A battle of words was carried on through many pages, which, like other contests of the metaphyficians, had fooner forced conviction, or had been continued without logomachy, if the disputants had explained their own terms. The Abbé meant to fay, that, in fact, the blood of no martyr had been fled; no patriot had hung on the fcaffold; no American citizen had been dragged to a dungeon; all which had been the energetic causes of revolutions in the European world. Against the fact, our author quoted the declaratory act, which

* Pag. 126, Pag. 103.

† This publication gave our author's old antagonist, the president, an opportunity of sneering at his illiterature.

Here is a letter written to an Abbé, said he, who is treated in it throughout as a third person. "The greater part of the Abbé's writings appear to me UNCENTRAL."

[P. 51.] Appear to me to be eccentric, the author probably intended. "It is a nseful addition." [P. 12.]

As if he was [were] glad to get from them. [P. 12.]

It is one of those kind of dominions." [P 70.] The president might have quoted many such peccadilles from our author's writings; but it ought to be always remembered, that our author is but a mere English scholar; and sew English scholars can write the English language.

left the colonies no rights at all: by it, the blood of martyrs was shed virtually; patriots were hanged virtually; citizens were dragged to dungeons virtually. There is no despotism to which this iniquitous law did not extend, contended our author furioufly *. Yet the Abbé could not be perfuaded, that this almost metaphysical question was of sufficient importance to make the people rife t. Alas! is it not always almost metaphysical questions, which have agitated mankind, and even now agitate the world! Our own historian of the last century, has treated this subject finely; because his representations are just, and his language is terfe:

- " When men fell out they knew not why;
- " When hard words, jealousies, and fears,
- " Set folks together by the ears;
- " And made them fight, like mad, or drunk,
- " For dame religion, as for punk;
- Whose honesty they all durst swear for,
- "Though not a man of them knew wherefore."

Our author turned awhile from the Abbé to teach America and Europe the nature of paper money. In five years, the Congress iffued about twelve millions sterling, in dollars of pasteboard. This emission of paper was a corner stone of independence. It was the Congress mode of finance, which, while it prevailed, faved twelve millions of taxes for carrying on the war; and confequently, the event to the people was exactly the fame, whether they funk twelve millions of money, by the depreciation of paper, or paid twelve millions by taxation. As early as March, 1780, common confent configned it to rest, with that kind of regard, which the long fervices of inanimate beings infenfibly obtain from mankind t. Our author's address is admirable, in mentioning every circumstance of commendation, while he fuppreffed every kind of objection. He concealed that the Congress made their pasteboards a legal payment of every debt, though they were of no more value than the almanacks of the last year. The fraudulent were thus enabled to pay the honest their just debts with waste paper. The rich were thereby defrauded, but the poor were not enriched. All property and all labour were depreciated by the same stroke of fraud. A revolution, which fo violently shook the interest and happiness of a country, has feldom occurred before. The Abbé was fo fimple as to confider this difcredited paper as an effential part of the Congress debt. Not fo our author: with charming apathy he afferted, in 1782, with us its fate is now determined. This is a fine illustration of the maxims and practice of the metaphyfical reformers, who care not, when in pursuit of their theories, whose heart they rend, whose property they waste, whose fafety they endanger.

* Letter, p. 5. † Revolution, p. 127.

+ Letter to Raynal, p. 22-3.

Our author was more happy in shewing, that the Abbé, as an historian, hastens through his narrations as if he was glad to get from them §. It must be allowed to be true, as our author afferted *, that it is yet too foon to write the hiftory of the Revolution; and whoever attempts it precipitately will unavoidably miftake characters and circumftances, and involve himfelf in error and difficulty; yet is it never too foon to inculcate on nations the performance of contracts, or on individuals the practice of honesty, because both form the strongest cement of society.

Our author had fearcely dispatched his letter to Abbé Raynal, when he wrote an epistle to the Earl of Shelburne†. The noble Earl had said in Parliament, it seems, in a tone which still vibrates in the ears of Englishmen, that when Great Britain shall acknowledge American independence, the sun of Britain's glory is set for ever. Some other orator had also said, in some other house, What is the relinguishment of America but to desire a giant to sprink spontaneously into a dwarf? Our author reasons and laughs, and laughs and reasons with our Parliamentary prophets, through a little pamphlet of eight and twenty pages. It required not his ridicule to make folly ridiculous, his acuteness to detect fophistry, or his ability to overturn weakness. We have outlived the time; yet many a parliamentary prophecy is still unfulfilled. Great Britain continues to walk with a giant's port among the powers of the earth, even without the help of the Earl's energy.

* Letter, p. 2.

† A letter to the Earl of Shelburne, which was published at Philadelphia, the 29th of October, 1782, on his speech of the 10th of July, 1782.

Our author published his last Crisis on the 19th of April, 1783, the same day that a cessation of hostilities was proclaimed. This Essay was soon printed as a pamphlet, entitled Pain's Thoughts on the Peace. In eighteen pages he concluded his valedictory oration in the sollowing sentence: Now, Gentlemen, you are independent; sit down, and be bappy. But, happiness is not always in our own power. Without food and raiment, and shelter, what man, except Diogenes, ever was happy? When their rejoicings were over, the American citizens were all surprized, that they were not happy. Amidst distrust, and penury, and pride, and indolence, what happiness, alas! could they enjoy? They were all disappointed in their hopes; they were all exhausted in their fortunes; they were all suspicious in their tempers; they were all uneasy in their families; but, they were independent. In all this wailing and gnashing of teeth, our author—

" Found nothing left but poverty and praise.

The American Revolution is a happy instance of what may be done by metaphysical reformers, who run furiously forward, in pursuit of their theories, without regarding the end. In order to obtain independence, every principle, which ought to actuate the human heart, was weakened; all the maxims, which knit society together, were impugned; and government, which is the the efficacious energy of political unions, was contemned as an evil. But independence was obtained. Subordination however ceafed; justice fled from the land; freedom, and property, and life, were no longer fafe; the affociation among the States diffolved in its own infufficience; and the Congress continued to exist indeed, but difgraced by its impotence, and unavailing in its efforts. Mean time, Shey's rebellion raged for years in New England, the most vigorous of the American Republics. Civil discord distracted New York. Infurrection diffurbed the quiet of Philadelphia, which had once been the happy feat of concord and diligence; from which our author retired to Bordenton, in New Jersey, for shelter. The Southern States were all shaken, by similar diforders, owing to fimilar causes. The American Union was little respected in Europe. The American Citizens were diffrusted naturally by foreigners, when they distrusted one another. were confidered as a people, who were L 2 doomed doomed to distraction; to suffer the miseries of anarchy, till they should acknowledge by their conduct, that they rejected metaphysical theories, and regarded just government as the greatest good.

Whether our author fmiled at the mischief, which his pen had done, or lamented that his prescriptions had not produced happiness, it is impossible to tell. He feems to have been filent, because, during the ravings of anarchy, he could not be eafily heard. He certainly fuffered all the miferies of dependent penury. He busied himself for feveral years, in foliciting the American Assemblies to grant him some reward for having contributed by his labours to make the American Citizens independent and miferable. New York conferred on him forfeited lands at New-Rochelle, which, as they were neither tenanted nor cultivated, brought him no annual income. Pennfylvania gave him five hundred pounds; which, at fix per cent. may be confidered as a penfion fion of thirty pounds a year, current money, or eighteen pounds sterling; and thus were united, what he had anxiously wished to avoid, pension and Pain in the same paragraph *. Whether, any other of the States, or the Congress, relieved our author's needs, we have never heard. They were all poor, and unable to help themselves, distracted as they were by their maxims, and enseebled in their powers. As his principles and his pen were no longer of much use to the United States, our

S

3

r

n

e

X

n

* In the Maryland Journal, dated the 31st of December, 1784, there is the following article: "On the 6th instant, his Excellency John Dickenson, President of the State of Pennsylvania, sent a message to the Assembly respecting Mr. Thomas Pain, the author of Common Sense and other political pieces; strongly recommending to their notice his services and situation; and concluding in the subsequent words:—We conside that you will then seel that the attention of Pennsylvania is drawn towards Mr. Pain, by motives equally grateful to the human heart, and reputable to the republic; and that you will join with us in opinion, that a suitable acknowledgment of his eminent services, and a proper provision for the continuance of them in an independent manner, should be made on the part of this State."

author departed for France, in Autumn 1786; leaving the American Citizens to build up, as they could, the feveral fabricks, which he had contributed fo powerfully to overturn. They all experienced, after his departure, that it is more eafy to break windows than to mend them.

What writers on government fuppose to have happened in the darkest periods, when men existed as savages, actually occurred, in America, during September 1787. Three millions of people, who were urged by their miferies, affembled at Philadelphia, not indeed in person, but by delegates, to confider their prefent calamities, and provide for their future happiness. When these deputies met in Convention, with Washington at their head, they did not begin their deliberations, by reading our author's Common Sense. All had feen the people's fufferings. Like the metaphyfical statesmen of the old world, they did not deny the evidence of their own fenses. But, considering the general mifery as a fact, they proceeded to investigate the cause of that fact, which could not be difputed. running furiously in quest of private liberty and of public independence, the people have involved themselves in anarchy, and the States in imbecility. WE confider then, faid the Convention and Washington, self-legislation, or anarchy, as the efficient cause of all our ills. WE must remove the cause before we attempt to free the people from its effects. WE must put restraints upon self-legislation, upon selfactions, upon self-redress. WE must facrifice the principles, the paffions, the prejudices, of one, to the fafety of millions. WE must restrain the liberty of each, in order that the whole may be free. WE must, in this manner, establish restraint as the fundamental principle of the Society, into which we are about to enter. WE must lay re-Araint as the corner-stone of our new Constitution.

s, e.

S.

ne

ce

ng

ne

In that numerous convention there were men of republican principles, who, with our author's Common Sense in their hands, and their own importance in their heads, spoke a very different language. With our last breath, faid they, WE will retain felf-legislation, that inherent right of man to will for himfelf; because, where there is no selfwill, there can be no liberty. WE would as foon relinquish life itself, as part with felf-action; because what are freemen, if they cannot do as they please? WE will never agree to be restrained, they exclaimed; because restraint is the death of liberty.

In reply to these declamations, the convention and Washington argued very patiently. Remember, WE pray you, the people's miseries, and the people's cries: you have seen, that it is felf-legislation, or the power of willing as each thinks proper, which is the real cause of all their sufferings: self-action, or the practice of doing what each thinks sit, is the genuine effect of that efficient cause:

cause: have you not felt how the young abuse the old; how the strong overpower the weak; how the wicked oppress the virtuous: can you enjoy your own liberty where fuch abuses exist; and where all legislate and none obey? If you wish to be safe, you must relinquish this savageness for society: now, what is fociety, but a compact, either expressed, or understood, that private will shall submit to public will; that individual action shall be fubordinate to general direction; that no one shall will or do any action which is inconfistent with the rules and agency of the many: and, what is this fubordination and this obedience but rerestraint, that must necessarily be the foundation of fociety, which has been variously modified in different climes, as men were urged by their various fufferings.

y

e

.

1,

S

11

C=

is

nt

e:

The few in this convention were, in this manner, obliged to submit to the wills, and what is of more importance, to the reasons of the many. And the convention and Washington proceeded to form their compact, which is the record of their union; to establish their constitution, which is the detail of its end; and to fettle their government, which is the means of effectuating the end of their union. Upon these reasonings they acted, though they were not unanimous. And finding it impracticable to fecure, either to individuals or communities, dependence and independence, fubordination and fovereignty, they modified their fystem, so as best to provide for the interest and fafety of all t. Hiftory will record it as an indubitable proof of their wifdom, that they built as much as possible upon old foundations; preferving their old common law, their old acts of affembly, their old modes of public proceeding. It deducts, indeed, fomething from this commendation, that the met p'nyfical reformers, with our author as their instructor, are more active to pull down than to build; are more studious to recommend new theories than to act on old experience.

+ See Washington's Letter before-mentioned.

Those who have surveyed the regions of the earth must have everywhere feen focieties of fome kind, whose forms would no doubt be modified, by their ignorance, into greater fimplicity, or by their civilization, into more numerous checks. The Convention and Washington maturely considered all those varieties; and that great jurist, Mr. John Adams, had inspected every book, in every language, that he might lay before them the beauties and defects of the different governments, which had refulted from ancient wifdom and modern experience. this inquiry, and those considerations, the united wifdom of the new world adopted, as far as circumstances would allow, the British constitution, though our author's Common Sense had declared it to be a farce. The American constitution, which was then established, provided powers legislative, executive, M 2 and

1

1 g

-

r

0

ıll

and judicial. The legislative, which, as the fovereign, has the power of prefcribing rules of action for all, confifts of the House of Representatives, or Commons; of a Senate, or Peers; of the Prefident, or King; who have each a vote in the making of laws. executive power is vested in the president, with monarchical authority, who is entrusted with the whole energy of The judicial power is government. thrown into feparate departments, which distribute justice in the various districts that a wide country, and a fcattered people, require. Now, this is the British constitution, though it be less efficient, because the materials were less perfect; and though it be more complex, because circumstances required additional checks.

In this manner, and upon those principles, was settled the present American government, which has answered in practice beyond expectation. It is of importance to investigate the causes of that establishment and of that efficiency.

Our author, who had inculcated by his Common Sense *, that no power, which needs checking, can be from God, was now fortunately abfent. Sad diffrefs had induced the people to listen to plain truth; they had no longer a disposition to believe our author's doctrine, that the best government is a necessary evil; and recent experience had fully convinced them, that there can be no fecurity for property, freedom, and life, unless restraint be imposed by the laws, and government be obeyed, as the energy from which focial happiness can alone be enjoyed. Meantime, our author fafely arrived in Paris, the beginning of 1787. He carried with him his fame as a writer, and the model of a bridge, which shewed that he had a genius, equally formed for mechanics as for politics. The French academy viewed his model, and thanked him for the fight; but whether he gave the people of France, who were then beginning to think for themselves, a lesson or two of political happiness, we have never heard. Were we allowed to argue from experience, it might be easily proved, that since the epoch of his visit, the French have proceeded regularly

- " In falling out with that, or this,
- " And finding somewhat still amis."

Our author, like other animals who delight in favage life, longed to return to his old haunts. And he arrived at the White Bear, Piccadilly, on the 3d of September, 1787, just thirteen years after his departure for Philadelphia. Neither the length of years, nor the change of circumstances, prevented his former acquaintances from recognizing the specific staymaker, the individual grocer, the fame exciseman; but as he had taken French leave, he met fome old friends with new faces. In London, he did not remain long. Before the end of September he haftened to Thetford, where he found his mother, who was now advanced to the age of ninety, but oppressed by penury. At the the æra of rejoicing for independence, this dutiful fon had remitted his neceffitous parents twenty pounds, in payment, no doubt, of the money, which had been lent him on bond *, before his emigration. He now talked of allowing his mother nine shillings a week, to be paid by Whitefide, an American merchant, in London. But owing to the confusion in that trader's affairs, or to fome other cause, this allowance was foon stopped. At Thetford, he feldom faw the companions of bis youth; he went little out, being wholly occupied in reading, and in writing. He who has once been employed in great affairs cannot eafily condescend to converse with puny men, or look with gratification on little matters.

When our author had finished his reading and his writing at Thetford, he returned to London: and before the end of the year 1787, he published his Prospects on the Rubicon; or, an

e

0

٢, f

\t

ne

* See his mother's letter before, p. 38.

Investigation into the Causes and Consequences of the Politics to be agitated at the Meeting of Parliament*. This is an octavo tract of fixty-eight pages, which treats of the state of the nation. The affairs of Holland, which were then unsettled, are now a subject for history, whose pen will do justice to the conductors of a great transaction to a happy end. Beside temporary matters, our author gave his opinion of money, credit, and banking, of agriculture and manufacture, of commerce

* The critics ascertained the authorship by collation of the style. Thus, in page 59 of his Prospects, it is said, there is a uniformity in all the works of nature."-66 But there is another circumstance that do not fail to " impress foreigners," page 63.-" Where is the profit of manufactures, if there is [be] no encrease of money," page 39.-" But it fignifies not what name it bears, if the capital is [be] not equal to the redemption," p. 35. The amazing encrease and magnitude of the paper currency now floating in England, exposes her to a 66 shock as much more tremendous than the shock of the South Sea Funds, as the quantity of credit and paper currency is now greater than they were at that time," p. 24.-" But though Democrites [Democritus] could " fcarcely have forbore [forborn] laughing [laughter] at " the folly," p. 2. and and shipping: but, by remaining too long in America, he had allowed Dr. Adam Smith to occupy his ground, to forestal his thoughts, and to teach the people not to be terrissed by any pensioned pamphleteer. Our author's prospects soon faded from the public eye. And the news-papers had the impertinence to tell him, that he who had lately shewn America the road to independence, and now endeavoured to exalt France over England, was a fit subject for transportation to the one, or a proper object, à la lanterne, of the other.

During the year 1788, our author was chiefly occupied in building his bridge. For this end he made a journey to Rotheram, in Yorkshire, in order to superintend the casting of the iron by that ingenious man and respectable citizen Mr. Walker. While thus occupied at Rotheram, our author's French freedom is said not to have much pleased the English ladies. Their displeasure did not; however, prevent the operations of the surnace: and the bridge was at length erected, in a close at Leafing-Green; being an arch conftructed of iron, one hundred and ten feet in the span, five feet from the spring, and twenty-two feet in breadth. was erected chiefly at the charge of Mr. Walker; but the project had cost our author a large fum, which was mostly furnished by Mr. Whiteside, the American merchant, who foon difcovered, that advances without returns leave the trader, ere long, without money or credit. Our author's bridge is to this day shewn at the Yorkshire-Stingo, for a shilling. As this was not the first iron bridge, which was known to the English world, it is not easy to discover, why the projector, who had a model, should incur so great an expence merely to make a show.

It is, however, happy for mankind, that imprudence and folly feldom efcape punishment. Whitefide, by trusting much money in bad hands, foon became a bankrupt. The affignces, feeing fo great a fum as fix hundred and twenty pounds charged against our author, caused him to be arrested on the 29th of October, 1789, at the White Bear, in Piccadilly. He was carried to that commodious spunging house, which is kept by good Mr. Armstrong, in Cary-street. Here he lay, for three weeks, in durance vile. Those benevolent persons, Benjamin Vaughan, Mr. Hoare the quaker, and William Vaughan, all interested themselves in his fate. They asked the assignees, if they knew that they confined the great writer of Common Sense. Our concern, faid they, is not with the dignity, but the identity of the debtor: Will you be his fecurity, to obtain his freedom? Upon the departure of his visitors, without obtaining his liberty, our author is faid to have hummed—

But shift you for money from friend to friend."

He now applied to Meffrs. Clagget and Murdock, two American traders of great respectability; pleading his services to them as Americans, in giving them independence. Without confidering themfelves as much obliged to him for confining rather than enlarging their trade, they became his bail. And our author paying four hundred and fixty pounds, which he had at length received from America, and giving his own note for one hundred and fixty more, was fet free, in November, 1789, to purfue his projects, and to fcribble pamphlets.

While thus restrained in Cary-street, by a power which he had never authorized, our adventurer was not inattentive to French affairs. In France he had beheld the fair blossoms of liberty in the genial Spring; he had seen the vigorous shoots of Summer's invigoration; and he now hastened to that happy land, in order to partake in the autumnal maturity of the fairest fruit, that metaphysicians had ever cultivated in the fields of theory. While thus gratisted, by enjoying the harvest of his own labours, he had the additional pleasure of perusing Dr. Price's celebrated fermon, which had been frowned from England, into France. But, while he faw the people of France thinking and acting for themselves, he heard with astonishment, no doubt, that the people of England were about to resign the prerogative of thinking *.

In this Crisis, our author recrossed the channel, in order to protest against this vasfalage idea t, and to avert that submission of themselves and their posterity, like bond-men and bond-women, for ever t. He was encountered, as he ran to London, by Mr. Burke's pamphlet, which was published a few days before the fad celebration of the French Revolution, on the 5th of November, He may have heard indeed, 1790. what doubtlefs quickened his fteps, that fuch a work was in the prefs, and though long delayed, was at length to appear. Never was the public expectation more amply gratified. Such vi-

* Prospects on the Rubicon, p. 29.

+ Rights of Man, p. 82.

t Id.

gour from fixty-three the world had feldom feen. Thousands and tens of thousands of Mr. Burke's pamphlet were fold, without the recommendation of the Constitutional Society. But, it was not the wisdom of his policy, or the zeal of his patriotifm, the learning of his illustrations, or the bursts of his eloquence, which captivated the Engtifb nation. No: The universal applause of the English people, was an indubitable proof of their genuine fentiments: It was a declaration of their affection for the king; of their attachment to the constitution; of their veneration for the laws; of gratitude to their fathers, who had transmitted the fystem, which ensures to them their prefent happiness. To Mr. Burke's pamphlet, every week produced a new answer. But, as his antagonists fought him on his own ground of law, their aims were feebly directed, and their attacks were eafily repulfed. The metaphyfical statesmen cried out for a new affault, upon a fresh field, by dissimilar weapons, weapons, according to the approved tactics of wordy warfare.

In this manner was our author induced to furbish up his old weapons of Common Sense, to fathion bis Crisis, ordinary and extraordinary, into a new cuirass, to review bis prospects, that he might take the vantage ground to " Decide all controversies by

" Infallible artillery."

A few months labour produced the far-famed pamphlet, ycleped Rights of Man. It was submitted to the revifal of Mr. Brand Hollis, and a committee of Democrats. It was fitted by them for the prefs, after fome struggles, between the defires of the author, and the wishes of his patrons. It was printed, in February 1791, for that worthy citizen, Mr. J. Johnson, in St. Paul's Church-yard; but his regard for the shop induced him to decline the felling of prohibited goods, though he occasionally dealt in Dr. Priestley's wares. This unexpected refufal caused a month's delay. A few copies were, however, imuggled  finuggled into private hands. Impatience was now apparent on every face. The defire of gratification became, as usual, more ardent, in proportion, as the object was denied. The men midwives determined to deprive the child of its virility, rather than so hopeful an infant should be with-held from the world. At length, on the 13th of March, 1791, this mutilated brat was delivered to the public, by Mr. J. S. Jordan, at N° 166, Fleet-street.

To the parent this was a moment of peculiar anxiety. Befide his cares for his child, he feared that the messengers of the press might be even then prowling for their prey. He found shelter and concealment in the hospitable house of the said Mr. Hollis; and in order to carry the hounds from their scent, Mr. Barthelemy, the secretary of the French embassy, ran about whispering in every ear, that he had less night given Mr. Pain a pass for Paris; though every Englishman, to whom this tale was told, did not hear with the same patience, tience, that French agents should trouble themselves with English affairs. It is hardened guilt only which is never fearful. While concealment was thus studiously consulted, the messengers of the press did not trouble themselves about Mr. Pain or his pamphlet.

Such was the agency by which this production was brought to the notice of the English nation. There were numbers, no doubt, who praised it; because they wished that its tenets were triumphant. There are fome who, in every country, rejoice to fee real learning defied by grofs illiterature. And the Constitutional Society, whose business it is to spread constitutional information, strenuously recommended this constitutional tract to the people's perufal. But it was still to encounter the critics. This is a race of men, whose hearts are generally contracted by years; whose judgments, being matured by experience, are not often captivated by novelty; and whose pens are fometimes dipped in gall, by an exceffive impartiality.

e,

After a decorous procrastination, the critics reviewed our author's perform-They divided their strictures ance. into two heads; the manner, and the matter. With regard to the first, they observed, that as the language immediately offers itself to the reader's eye, and must ultimately inform the reader's understanding; so the language is an effential object of the critic's animadversion. Of style, perspicuity is the principal quality, without which, all other qualities are ufelefs; but without grammatical purity, that great effential of language cannot be obtained. Like fair critics, they gave examples, as the best proofs of their precepts; and they arranged their observations, and stated their quotations, under distinct clasfes, in the following order:

THE BAD GRAMMAR OF A CHILD.

In page 15, Mr. Pain fays, "There is [are] some proposals for a declaration of rights."—In p. 34, "There are [is] in all countries, a large class of peo-66 ple of that description, which, in " England, are [is] called the mob."-In p. 35, "A vast mass of mankind " are [is] degradedly thrown into the " back ground."—In p. 45, " Because " there bave [has] been an upstart of " governments, thrusting themselves " between."—In p. 66, "The folly of " titles bave [has] fallen."—In p. 81, " The parliamentary language is free, " and extend [extends] to all the parts." In p. 82, "This vaffalage idea, and " ftyle of speaking was [were] not got " rid of at the revolution."- In p. 92. " As money matters was [were] the ob-" ject."—In p. 100, "When their " worth and consequence is [are] con-" fidered."—In p. 104, "There was " [were] a visible imbecillity and want " of intellects in the majority."—In p. 116, "Does not [do] its own in-" habitants fay, it is a market."-But of fuch examples enow, though other instances, which are equally level to a child's capacity, might be added.

5

THE BAD GRAMMAR OF A MAN.

In page 5, Mr. Pain fays, " Why Mr. Burke should commence an unprovoked attack is a conduct that cannot be pardoned, on the fcore of manners, nor [or] justified on that of policy." Thus, the why must be the nominative of the verb is; and cannot and nor are 1700 negatives in the fame fentence. In p. 6, " But fuch is the ingenuity of his hope, or the malignity of his despair, that it [they] furnishes him with new pretences." In p. 56, "Have fit" for fat or fitten. In p. 71, "The greatest characters have rose," for risen. In p. 72, " Whether the archbishop precedes," [precede]. In p. 75, " If he believes," [believe]. In p. 81, "If any matter comes," [come]. These and many other examples, which might be quoted, evince, faid the critics, that Mr. Pain has no notion of the fubjunctive mood. In p. 79, "There are frequently appearing in the London Gazette, extracts from certain acts to prevent prevent machines, and as far as it [they] can extend to perfons." In p. 79, "The representatives of the nation, which [who] compose the national affembly, and who [which] are the legiflative power, originate in the people by election, as an inherent right." This terrible fentence had ended better thus : " The reprefentatives originate in the people, who have an inherent right to choose representatives." In p. 115, "What are the prefent governments of Europe, but a scene [scenes] of iniquity." In p. 116, "Since the taking [of] the Bastile." But of such quotations from Mr. Pain's pamphlet there would be no end!

Under the head of grammatical purity, the critics proceeded to remark, that pure English necessarily requires, that the words be English; that their construction be in the English idiom; that the words be employed to express the precise meaning, which custom has affixed to them. The fault of using words words, which are not English, has been called by grammarians

BARBARISM.

Thus Mr. Pain uses the following words which are not English: in p. 67, Punyism; in p. 74, Intolleration; in p. 77, Anti-political; in p. 35, Degradedly; in p. 80, Designates; in p. 81, Right-angled; in p. 85, Priorily; in p. 96, Disrespected; in p. 104, High-benisiced; in p. 110, Imprescriptible.

The fecond fault, which confifts of not making use of the words in the English idiom, philologists have agreed to denominate

SOLECISM,

Mr. Pain, for example, has used, in page 66, "Chivelry character:" now, chivelry is not an adjective. In p. 76, "By engendering the church with the state, a fort of mule animal is produced." In p. 71, "He degenerate the human species." Degenerate is not an active verb. In p. 80, "Neither can he use it consistent [consistently] with the constitution."

flitution." In p. 84, both is used to couple plurals. In p. 85, "The nation showed no disposition to rise [rouse] from its lethargy." In p. 95, "The crowd threw out trite expressions: he perhaps meant tart. In p. 96, "The king, as if unconsulted upon with the cabinet." In p. 101, "They situated [placed] themselves in three chambers." In p. 109, "The conspiracy being thus dispersed [dissolved] or [the conspirators being dispersed]. Solecisms abound so much in Mr. Pain's pamphlet, that they may, indeed, be said to occur in every paragraph.

The third and last class of faults against purity of language, the critics arranged under the head of

IMPROPRIETY.

In page 88, Mr. Pain remarks, "That the deplomatic character is the narrowest fphere of society that a man can act in:" thus, with his usual violence, he converts his ambassador into a globe.
"And a deplomatic," [diplomatic] he adds, adds, " is a fort of unconnected atom, continually repelling and repelled." We have no fuch substantive as diplomatic, which, as a foreigner, is hardly endured as an adjective. "But this," fays Mr. Pain, page 88, "was not the cafe with Dr. Franklin. He was not the deplomatic of a court, but of man." He meant to have faid, this philosopher is the envoy of mankind. But of deplomatic enough! In p. 89, Mr. Pain fays historically, "That the then marquis de la Fayette was in close friendship with the civil government of America, as well as with the military line." Private friendship with a civil government; friendship with a line!! In p.81, Mr. Pain remarks, "That the addresses of the English parliaments are not of foreign extraction, but originate from the Norman Conquest: they [the faid addreffes] are evidently of the vaffalage class of * manners; and," he adds, " that this vasfalage idea and stile of speaking

* Page 82.

"Submission," he proceeds †, " is wholly a vassage term, repugnant to the dignity of freedom, and an echo of the language used at the conquest." Thus, submission is an echo of language!!
"The graceful pride of truth preserves," he afferts ‡, " in every latitude of life the right-angled character of man." Such restangular improprieties of language, ill-natured critics might detect in every passage; since they certainly stand in every paragraph of one hundred and fixty pages ||.

The critics closed their strictures, with regard to the manner, by recommending to Mr. Pain, with more good nature than generally relaxes the brow of criticism, to study the English language. With his abilities, and the aid of philology, they declared he might foon qualify himself to write English, such as an Englishman would endure. They kindly advised him to begin with Ash's Institutes, to proceed to Priesley's Rudiments, to go on to Lowth's Introduction, and to end with his friend Horne Tooke's Diversions of Purley.

† Page 82. ‡ Page 81.

| See p. 79, 84, 91, 104, 108, 108-9, 120, 122, 125, 126, 127, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 136, 139, 140, 146, 147, 149, 150, 152, 154, 155, 156, 157, 159, 160, &ce.

To this elaborate criticism there is a short answer. Let the quotations be allowed to be accurate *; and an unquestionable fact will furnish a proper reply: the manuscript of Rights of Man was revised and altered by Mr. Brand Hollis, and a committee of Democrats, as before-mentioned. Now, the Editors, who use the freedom to change the style of their author, are answerable for the consequences. It was unkind also in the Constitutional Society, formed, as it is, of Doctors of Law, Doctors of Divinity, and Doctors of Physic, to recommend the castrated edition of Jordan, before they had tortured the style.

* The Critics appear to have used the genuine edition of Johnson.

The critics proceeded, Secondly, as they had proposed, from the language to the sentiment; from the manner to the matter of our author's great performance.

This is a disquisition, said they, with regard to RIGHTS OF MAN. By thus suppressing designedly the article the, he shews his intention to be, not to treat of the whole rights of mankind, but of particular rights. And, with great propriety he follows up his evident purpose, by enlarging chiefly on the savage rights of man, without regarding much their social rights.

When he dedicated his book to George Washington, he seemed however, said they, to depart somewhat from his previous design. He now wished, that the rights of man might become as universal as Washington's benevolence. They doubted the propriety of our author's sentiment; be-

1

S

ed

110

P 2

cause

cause the rights of man must be as universal as the residence of mankind.

The critics were thence led into a very learned inquiry into the cause that Nonsense so often escapes being detected, both by the Writer and the Reader. They were at no loss to discover various causes of this phenomenon; namely, confusion of thought; affectation of excellence; want of meaning: and considering, that our author's pamphlet had been affectedly praised and politically propagated, they seized so good an occasion to give illustrations of their salutary doctrine, by exhibiting various examples of our author's

NONSENSE.

In page 48 it is faid, "That the duty of man is not a wilderness of turnpike gates, through which he is to pass by tickets from one to the other." Here, said the critics, the author in attempting to give a specimen of fine writing, wrote without meaning. In p. 51, "That governments ing.

" might avail themselves of every en-" gine in their favour, they united " fraud to force, and fet up an idol, " which they called Divine Right; and " which, in imitation of the Pope, who " affects to be spiritual and temporal, " and in contradiction to the founder " of the Christian religion, twisted it-" felf afterwards into an idol of ano-" ther shape, called Church and State." Here is an instance of the unintelligible, from the length of the fentence. In page 66, Mr. Pain quotes it as a maxim, "Titles are but nicknames, and every nickname is a title;" and he states it as a fact, "That it is properly from the elevated mind of France, that the folly of titles have [has] fallen." This writer is not more happy in his religious opinions; in p. 74, "Toleration is not the opposite of intoleration, but is the counterfeit of it. Both are despotisms; the former is church and state, and the latter is church and traffic." Mr. Pain was thence led on to fpeak, in page 80, of the fountain of honour:

" In England, a king is the fountain; but as this idea is evidently from the Conquest, I shall make no other remark upon it, than that it is the nature of conquest to turn every thing upfide down; and as Mr. Burke will not be refused the privilege of speaking twice, and as there are but two parts in the figure, the fountain and the spout, he will be right the fecond time." After this transparent elucidation of the fountain of bonour, he naturally tells, in p. 138, what a parliament is: " What is called the parliament, is made up of two houses; one of which is more hereditary, and more beyond the controll of the nation, than what the crown, (as it is called) is supposed to be." He goes beyond even this, in page 139: "The continual use of the word constitution, in the English parliament, shews there is none; and that the whole [of what] is merely a form of government, without a constitution." As an illustration of this mode of writing the fublime, the critics quoted the famous famous couplet of two illustrious authors:

" My wound is great, because it is so small;

" It would be greater, were it none at all!"

Mr. Pain thence descends to meaner matters, and gives in page 144, a mathematical estimate of the quantity of money: "Lisbon and Cadiz are the two ports into which [money] gold and silver from South America are imported, and which afterwards divides and spreads itself over Europe, by means of commerce, and increases the quantity of money in all parts of Europe." The critics at last exclaimed:

" How vast a head is here without a brain!"

But they had foftened this feverity of animadversion, had they known then what is now known, that Mr. Brand Hollis and the committee of democrats corrected the manuscript, and that Jordan, the bookseller, castrated the copy *. Such freedoms are the more reprehensible, as they leave the republic of letters to dispute the identity of the book, and after times to investigate the real sentiments of so great an author.

* The castrating hand of Mr. Jordan appears in the title-page; he there makes Thomas Paine, a secretary for foreign

After so learned an exposition of the causes why writers write, and readers read Nonsense, without perceiving that they write and read nonsensically, the critics proceeded regularly to review the matter of Mr. Pain's pamphlet under the three beads, into which he divides himself: the argument; the history; the miscellaneous.

It was a fad fight, faid they, to fee at the opening of the controversy, so able a polemick as Mr. Pain turn his back on his opponent. Mr. Burke every where considers the British Constitution as an actual authority, and the legislative power, the executive power, and the judicial power, which are emaforeign affairs to Congress, instead of the secretary to a committee of Congress for foreign affairs. The clerk of the House of Commons, and the clerk of a committee of that House, are quite distinct officers.

nations

nations from it, as existing energies, which preferve the quiet of the public, and produce the happiness of the people. On the other hand, Mr. Pain throughout bis argument, not only fupposes, but afferts, that the British Consitution no where exists; that the constitutional fystem, confisting of the legiflative, the executive, and judicial powers, were its existence acknowledged, has no valid authority to direct or punish any grown man. As a logician, then, he supposes what he ought to prove; and as a philosopher he afferts, much more than argues, against incontrovertible facts. Thus, Mr. Pain, as a bruiser, shifts before he is struck, and falls before he has put in his blow. And thus the bully, who turns his back, and shifts, and finks, even before the fet-to, shews that he is conscious of his own weakness, or fears the strength of his antagonist.

The great art, faid the critics, of Mr. Pain, as a polemick, confifts in misquoting plainly, or misrepresenting design-defignedly, the positions of his adverfary. Mr. Burke faid farcastically, that every future king of England would fucceed hereditarily to the government, in contempt of the Constitutional Socie-Mr. Pain now converts, by the magick of his wand, this plain affertion of fact and law into a positive affirmation of an hereditary fuccession in contempt of the people: and he thereupon enjoys, through twenty pages, the triumph of his own artifice; without reflecting, that the day of detection would come, when the fophister would be exhibited to his own sentimental mob, as an object of ridicule.

In treating of rights of men, faid the critics, Mr. Pain either artfully, or ignorantly, refers always to the rights of favages; never to the rights of citizens. How ridiculous is it to reason about the circumstances of men who do not exist on earth. Within the wide circumstence of the globe, there have not been found a people, however savage, who had not some rules of action.

tion. A fair reasoner, then, was bound to refer, in his argument, to those rules, as existing energies. Every nation, however civilized, or however favage, has its own civil rights, which are the refult of those energies: we fpeak familiarly of the rights of Englishmen, the rights of Dutchmen, and the rights of Ruffians. All those various rights fpring out of their feveral systems. If there be a question with regard to the rights of Englishmen, we must refer for a solution to the laws of Englishmen. And, in the same manner, if it be inquired, what fact constitutes the crime of swindling in England, we must refer to the statute, which describes the offence; so of perjury, forgery, and other offences, which, as they infringe the rights of particular citizens, are regarded as attacks upon the whole fociety.

All this was premifed, faid the critics, in order to enable the reader to determine the grand question, which was debated first between Dr. Price and

Mr. Burke, and, fecondly, betwixt Mr. Burke and Mr. Pain, as to the manner of cashiering government, and chusing governors. Among cool reasoners, it must be allowed in argument, that if every man, woman, and child, in any community, were to vote for cashiering government, they have a right to give fuch yote, and to appoint new governors. But, did every man, woman, and child, ever meet for fuch purposes? Never. Will every man, woman, and child, ever meet for such purpofes? Never: for it is physically impossible, that every man, woman, and child should ever meet together for any purpose. To talk of deputies is not to conquer the difficulty. The very appointment of delegates to do any act is an advance within the limits of fociety: but Mr. Pain is in a favage state; he is arguing about rights of men who have not yet entered into fociety; and, therefore, it is not allowable, in candid discussion, to mingle different rights together; to borrow from the laws of fociety, in order to fupport support the feeble condition of favageness; and yet, to insist, that he adopts none of the notions of society, for the uses of sophistry.

This grand question, then, is to be determined by the maxims of general society; by the rules of the particular society of Great Britain. Thus much being settled, said the critics, there can be no doubt, that according to the laws of the land, every man, any number of men, any community, may petition for redress of grievances; for the repeal of an old law, or the introduction of a new one. This is done daily, during the sitting of parliament, and it is done rightfully. About this right, then, there is no question.

S

e

0

S

e

le

W

0

rt

But the question is, whether, according to the laws of Great Britain, any man, any number of men, any club of men, may attempt by violence to cashier governors, to change government, or to alter the constitution. The answer is, that the laws of Great Britain do not allow such attempts; that the laws of Great Britain punish all perfons, as traitors, who make fuch attempts. Thus Lord Loughborough explained the law, upon the point, when he delivered his charge to the grand jury, in the Borough, who were to indict the rioters, in 1780*. Thus upon the trial of Lord George Gordon, Lord Mansfield declared the opinion of the whole court, which was not controverted by any lawyer or any man. Lord Mansfield went a step further: as there had been fome doubts, he declared the opinion of the judges to be, that though every one, and any number of persons, had a right to ask for the redrefs of grievances, yet the petition must be prefented by no more than ten persons, or the parties would be punished as criminals t.

* The critics generally use such authorities as they have at hand: and they quoted, on this occasion, that useful book, Dodsley's Register, 1780, p. 277, for Lord Loughborough's celebrated charge.

† Dodsley's Register, 1781, p. 236, for Lord Mansfield's more celebrated charge to the jury.

But this mode of reasoning has no weight with Mr. Pain. He declares the constitution of Great Britain not to exist; the laws not to exist; the government not to exist. We are now, faid the critics, discussing an important fubject candidly. It is not fufficient to affert any position from, which interesting deductions are to be drawn; upon which Revolutions are to be built. Every reasoner must prove his own premifes, before he be allowed to draw his conclusions. Now, as it is a fact, to the truth of which the fenses of a whole nation bear testimony, that the conftitution, and laws, and government, of Great Britain do exist, we are obliged, faid the critics, to tell Mr. Pain, that as a reasoner he argues here, and through the greater part of his pamphlet, most illogically; because he constantly reasons against facts.

When it is once admitted in argument, because it cannot be denied, that Great Britain is a formed society, having a constitution and laws, it follows as an undeniable consequence, that all the political cases in Mr. Pain's pamphlet are to be determined by a reference to the code; to the body of laws. It is, therefore, unphilosophical in Mr. Pain, to refer continually in his reasonings, to a state of favageness that does not, in fact, exist; or, indeed, to any other state than the laws of the particular country, about which he treats. And as old men, faid the critics, we are thus led to suspect, that the ultimate object of Mr. Pain, and of those who circulate his tract, must be, to give themselves little trouble about the confritution and laws of Great Britain, when they can collect numbers enow to annihilate all by a tumult.

We were urged, faid the critics, by our years and our apprehensions, to look forward from such reasonings and such an object, to the end. What would be the immediate consequences of annihilating the constitution and the laws by a tumult? All the rights of society, which are emanations from them them, would be annihilated by the fame stroke of violence. Whoever holds any right under the common law, would lofe it; whoever enjoys any privilege under an act of parliament, would lofe it; whoever partakes of any franchife from a charter, would lose it: for all those rights are derived only from the laws of fociety, and the foundation being removed, the fuperstructure must fall. Yes, say the metaphyfical reformers, with wonderful apathy, all this and more would happen, if fuch events were not prevented; but we can remove your apprehensions by a fingle vote, that fuch mischiefs shall not ensue. Having lived long enough, faid the critics, to prefer present enjoyment to future expectation, we would not trust our liberty, our effects, and our lives, to the promifed vote of a metaphyfical mob.

Thus much, then, with regard to the argument of Mr. Pain's pamphlet. The critics proceeded, fecondly, to consider the historical part. As an his-

d

t

S

0

f

n

II

R

torian,

torian, Mr. Pain plainly takes his fide. He avows his purpose, to elevate one party, and to deprefs the other. A party pamphlet may answer a party purpofe: but mankind agree to reprobate a party history. The style, which in history is of essential consequence, being written to please and instruct, will, no doubt, gratify all those who find delight in bad grammar and false idiom; in harshness of expression and feebleness of pause. It was reported in 1784, we may remember, that Mr. Pain intended to write the history of the American war: but, from this specimen of his impartiality and his language, we are led to imagine, that, however many readers he might meet among the heroes of his tale, he would find few in Britain.

The critics proceeded, thirdly, to the miscellaneous part of Mr. Pain's pamphlet. As they had said already so much of society, government, and law, they chiefly reviewed what he delivered on political economy. All that he had retailed in his Prospects on the Rubicon, with regard to money and credit, and commerce, he interweaves into his Rights of Man. As he deals much in dogmas, he now disposes of great variety of fuch goods. He is, however, chiefly anxious to prove, that there is no wealth but money. The cattle of the farmer are not wealth, it feems; whatever wares the shop-keeper may have in the warehouse, he is not wealthy, if he have no money in the till; the knowledge and industry of a tradesman are not wealth, if he have no cash in the chest. By thus afferting money alone to be wealth. and flewing how much coin had been brought into this island, and how little remained; he endeavours to prove, that Great Britain has at prefent less commerce and opulence, than in former times. He has no notion, it feems, that there is a traffic in bullion. He does not know, that foreign coins are continually imported and fent out, just as there is a demand for them at R 2 home

t

d

0

O

V,

d

home or abroad: but, faid the critics, fince the people were instructed by the Political Oeconomy of Steuart, and the Wealth of Nations of Smith, they are not to be captivated by such sophisms and sooleries.

The foregoing criticism, with all its elaboration, admits of a fatisfactory answer Let the truth be told, and justice be done, whatever may be the confequences. Our author knew, that he afferted what he could not prove; that he misrepresented what he could not controvert; that he aimed to delude rather than convince: and his defign to vent his prejudices, and ferve a party, must be carefully scanned, before his merits can be accurately fettled, either as a writer or a man. foresee, but we despise the retort, which malignity may make, that in order to establish his abilities you must facrifice his morals.

Notwithstanding the reviews of criticism, our author received the applause of party. Nay, philology came in the person person of Horne Tooke, who found his retreat after fome inquiry, to mingle her gratulations with the thanks of greater powers: You are, faid he, like Fove, coming down upon us in a sporver of gold. Our author was highly gratified by fuch attentions; yet he was not happy: he plainly wished for something that was studiously withheld. Like honest Rousseau, he longed for profecution. While fluttering on the wing for Paris, he hovered about London a whole week, waiting to be catched, not by the catchpoles of creditors, but by the runners of Bow-street.

1

S

e

e

h

0 ce

1-fe

10

n

Yet, the meffengers of the prefs would not meddle either with his perfon, or his pamphlet. Upon what motives the government of England acted, with regard to both, we have never heard. Whether the ministers trusted to the good fense of England, which generally gains the afcendant; whether they left his flyle to be detected by the school-boys of England; whether they relinquished his fentiment to be defpifed by the men of England; whether they they gave up such a character to the contempt of the women of England; we may conjecture, but cannot tell.

At length, flung by disappointment, our author departed for France, about the middle of May, 1791. He foon found that his prescriptions had worked wonders. The land was tranquil: the people were happy. Yet, in the midst of this tranquility and happiness, the executive power departed from Paris: The executive power was foon arrested by the executive power. These events induced our author to observe, with his usual coolness, to his congenial friend, Mr. Thomas Christie: "You see the ab-" furdity of monarchical governments; " here will be a whole nation diffurbed " by the folly of one man *!" Thus the tongue continually blurts out the prevailing thoughts of the heart! The experience of fuch men had never taught them what mischiefs had arisen, in every country, from the madness of the multitude.

* See Mr. Thomas Christie's letter, dated from Paris, June 22d, 1791; and published in the Morning Chronicle, of the 29th of June, 1791.

An example foon occurred, which ought to have instructed both: a fentimental mob † affembled in Paris, to behold the executive power return; and concurrence of opinion led our author to mingle with the many, on that pleafing occasion. An officer proclaimed the will of the National Affembly, that all should be filent and covered. In a moment, all tongues were still; all hats were on. Not fo our author: He had loft his cockade; and to have a hat, without a cockade, was treason. A cry arose, Aristocrat! Aristocrat! A' la lanterne! A' la lanterne! Whether he preferved his ufual coolness, during this uncommon danger, we are unable to tell. A Frenchman, who could fpeak English, defired him to put on his hat: But, the hat having no cockade, he was involved in a fad dilemma, and the fentimental mob was at length in fome measure satisfied by prudent explanation. Our author was now left to balance cooly in equal fcales, whether the folly of one man. or the madness of the multitude, be most mischievous, be most inconsistent with freedom. Metaphyfical prejudice, like the jaundice, gives a yellow colour to every emanation of the mind. And we may eafily suppose, that our author, like other men, who confound liberty and anarchy together, was not even now convinced, by his personal danger, that there is no fafety for property, freedom, or life, in a country, where the individual may be instantly executed, for having no cockade in his He returned to London just time enough to partake in the celebration of the French Revolution, on the 14th of July, 1791.

Biography treats only of the past. Prophecy alone can reveal the future. And, as we are not prophets, we will not conjecture with regard to our author's subsequent life and fate.

FINIS

requires no depth of thought, the female mind feems most happily formed. More lively than penetrating, and more rapid than contemplative, it can easily turn from moral and religious studies and occupations to the elegant or ornamental accomplishments, and from the ornamental accomplishments to the management of a family; and, if not immoderately occupied by either, can attend to all with equal

In this manner Mr. Polwhele proceeds at some length to enforce the duties of a mother, but our limits here oblige us to stop, with an acknowledgment of the pleafure we have received from the greater part of the work.

Prospects and Observations, on a Tour in England and Scotland, Natural, Economical, and Literary. By Thomas Newte, Esq. With a Map of Scotland on a large Scale; and 23 Engraved Copper-plates. 4to. 11. 1s. Robinsons.

THE first circumstance that strikes us in this highly-decorated Publication, is the lowness of its price. Though almost all of the numerous engravings be done by Heath and Cary, it is little more than at the rate of the half of what our journalists, and even our gentlemen travellers, lay upon their Tours, though the embel-liments be executed by inferior artists. One Guinea for a work of fuch fize, and fo many elegant views, is a mere trifle, confidering the heavy expence that must have been incurred by such decorations, as well as the advanced price of adverti-This is fing, of paper, and of printing. an example worthy to be imitated by men of capacity, of leifure, and of fortune; fome of whom we could name that are as rapacious for money, and as ready to avail themselves of the public curiosity, and tathe for painting, as the merest bookmaker in any of the Inns of Court, or St. George's Fields, or remotest skirts of Marybone. That these " Prospects and Observations," therefore, may be considered, to a certain degree, as a present to the public, might be affirmed literally, even if they did not contain so great a vanety of amusement and instruction.

The nature and object of this publication is briefly set forth in a short and modest Advertisement; in which the Author says, that nothing but the hope of being, in some degree, beneficial to mankind, would have induced him to offer these Views and Observations to the public.

The nature of that "benefit to mankind" to which Captain Newte alludes in his Advertisement, and which is the professed object of his publication, is briefly expressed in his Dedication of it to the King, which was done by his Najesty's permission, and which at the same time that it is elegant, respectful, and even complimentary, breathes a manly and independent spirit.

VOL. XX.

" SIRE,

"I beg leave to present to Your Majesty a book which aims at a general description of the Northern parts of this Island; but whose principal object is to give a proper direction to the labour of the people, to improve their natural resources in the land and the sea, and to contribute to the independence, the happiness, and the increase of the most virtuous and useful part of the community.

" In former times, when the great body of the people groaned under feudal tyranny, the oppressed, in both England and Scotland, found now and then relief and confolation in the wife and humane attention of the Sovereign. While the higher ranks were protected by their privileges and their wealth, the Sovereign became the representative and the guardian of that helpless race of men; and the views of the most generous and enlightened Princes, co-operating with the advancement of knowledge, and the progress of commerce, at last burst the bands of a domineering aristocracy, and opened the doors of liberty wider and wider to the people.

"Yet even at this day, when the light of literature is extending far and wide; in the Northern part of the United Kingdom, ideas, customs, and laws still exist, highly unfavourable to freedom, and all the blessings of general and animated exertion. Agricultural improvement is thereby discouraged, commerce fettered, and the labouring poor subject to harsh and rapacious treatment from their superiors.

"These unfortunate circumstances I am ambitious of bringing under the review of the Father of his people.

"The world will acknowledge how natural it is to folicit, in favour of a publication of this kind, the acceptance and patronage of the munificent friend of all fiberal and good arts, whose generous cares are not confined to these Islands only, but extend to all quarters of the globe, and all races of men."

The whole of this excursion through England and Scotland, with the reflections and practical hints to which it gave birth, is divided in the Table of Contents into seven periods, or rather portions of space:

1. From Oxford to the border of Scotland.
2. From the border of Scotland to the entrance into the Highlands at Loch Lomond.
3. From Loch Lomond to Inverness.
4. From Inverness, by the Sea Coast, to Perth.
5. From Perth, by Stirling, to Edinburgh.
6. Edinburgh with its neighbourhood.
7. From Edinburgh to York.

Edinburgh to York.

Under the first of these divisions, our Author sets out with reflections on the nature and advantages of diaries, which will probably be considered as equally just and ingenious; being true, though not obvious or common.

"There is not one hour in the life of man that is exactly the fame with another, during the whole course of his existence, from the cradle to the grave. New objects, circumstances, and fituations; new ideas, emotions, and patitions blended together, according to their different shades and order of fuccession, and producing fancies, hopes, and fears in endless variety, render human life the most variegated as well as the most fleeting teene, with which we are at all acquainted in the whole circle of nature. As the power of language is unable to arrest and describe the mixed emotions of the mind at the moment they pass, so it is far less fitted to recall them at pleasure. But if we cannot clothe in language, and mark down the various fentiments and feelings that occupy our minds in different times and tituations, it is in our power in some measure to make up for this deficiency, by recording the objects that occasioned them; and the diaries in which these are comprehended afford, at least to him who takes the troubie of making them, a very curious and interesting subject of both entertainment and improvement. If the unvaried and uninteresting voids of life should form but little adapted to the composition of such journals, travels and voyages not only furnish materials for collections of this kind, but naturally induce men to make them.

Our Author makes various reflections on Oxford and Cambridge, and thews the importance of the Universities, and a Public education at these venegable seats of the Mases, in a political and a new lights visits Haythorpe, and describes the courtry around and the state of agriculture; and paths on with a great variety of de. scriptions and remarks as he goes to Cha. pel-house, Long Compton, Stratford upon Avon, and the town of Birmingham. Speaking of this famous place, he tays, "This town is far from being diftinguished by zeal in religion. Dr. Prieffley's latitudinarian principles are adopted by those who confider themselves as philosophers; but the great mais of the people give them. selves very little concern about religious matters, feldom if ever going to church, and spending the Sundays in their ordinary working apparel, in low debauchery, What religion there is in Birmingham is to be found among the differers. It is well known, that there are many coiners of false money in Birmingham, a circumstance that is easily accounted for, from the nature of the bufiness in which they have been accustomed to be employed; it may be added, that there is a great deal of trick and low cunning among the Birmingham manufacturers in (though there are, no doubt, some exceptions), as well as profligacy of manners. This may be owing in part to their want of early education; for the moment that the children are fit for any kind of labour, initead of being fent to school, they are fet to fome fort of work; but it is probably more owing to their being constantly affociated together, both in their labouring and in their idle hours. It is remarkable, that fociety corrupts the manners of the vulgar as much as it sharpens their understanding.

21

11

Ь

li

1

" About fifty years ago there were only three principal or leading streets in Birmingham, which at this day is fo creuded, and at the same time so extensive a town: a circumstance which illustrates in a very striking manner the rapid increase of our manufactures and trade in steel and iron. It is not above three years fince pavements, or foot-piths, formed of flag-stones upon the London plan, were first introduced in this place. The ladies at Birmingham at first considered these smooth pavements as very great grievances. They were not to convenient, they faid, as their old footpaths, or easy to walk on. And this was the more remarkable, that the threets and fide-paths were not laid with good paving, but with round hard stones about the fize of large apples, and of courte fuch as appeared to strangers to be very t oubleforne to the walker, and even painful.

"The industry of the people in those parts is wonderful. They live like the people of Spain and other hot countries, rifing at three or four o clock in the morning, going to rest for a few hours at noon, and afterwards working till nine or en o clock at night. The people of Birmingham, I fpeak of the middling and ordinary class of manufacturers, ret in in many things, as has been already obferved in the instance of their attachment to taverns and other public houses, the manners of other times. They are expensive in eating and drinking, and in clothes too; but they give themselves no trouble about the stile or mode in which they Men who employ under them great numbers of workmen, and who frend from two to three hundred a year, live in their kitchens; which are kept remarkably clean however, in good order, and well furnished. This is by no means mentioned as a matter of either contempt or reproach, but the contrary. There is a natural and indeed necessary connection between industry and economy, as there is between both and the prosperity of a nation. From the introduction of luxury and the decay of manufactures, the United Provinces have begun to decline in wealth, population, and power. Indolence and Pleafure, the parents of Idleness and Corruption, have begun to fap the foundations of a state which was raised on industry, temperance, and frugality."

From Birmingham our travellers (for

From Birmingham our travellers (for Captain Newte informs us that he was accompanied by friends, whose social sympathy enlivened the impressions made by every object) pass on to Sutton, Lutchfield, Burton, Derby, Matlock with its environs, Dovedale, Bakewell, Chatsworth, Buxton, Castleton, Peak, Manchester, Worsley, Warrington, Frescot, Liverpool, Ormskirk, Preston, Gardang, Lancaster, Hornby, Kirby Lonsdale, Kendal, Bowness, the lakes and mountains of Cumberland, Penrith, and Carlisle.

. .

.

.

15

y

,

y

II.

1.

S

n

31

25

10

-

38 id

vut

ie.

ry

n.

he

Under the fecond period or division of the Tour, our travellers go to Annan, Dumfries, Mosfat, Elvanfoot, Drumlanrig the princely feat of the Duke of Queensberry, the fouth highlands of Scotland, the Clyde, the Tweed, and the Annan, Douglass Mill, Lanerk with the falls of the Clyde, the town with the park and palace of Hamilton, Bothwell Castle, Glasgow.

In the City of Glafgow there are eleven kirks besides fundry contenticles and meeting houses. The Societies, or Fellowship eighty-five meetings of the handicraftsmen of Glafgow, and chiefly the weavers, in which they instruct one another in metaphysical notions in theology, are celebrated by the petitions presented to Parliament by Lord G. Gordon. In fuch, and fo extensive a city, lying in the most puritanical part of Scotland, and in which fo great a proportion of the people are shut in from the open air and face of Nature, and confined to fedentary and often folitary employment, it is not to be wondered that there is much fanaticism, grimace, and hypocrify. It is not many years fince the magistrates of Glasgow, humouring the aufterity of certain of their clergy, and the general prejudices of the people, were wont to be very rigid in enforcing a judaical observance of the fab-The elders, a class of men in Scotland that feem to unite in their perfons for ewhat of the authority of curates, constables, and church wardens, used to fearch on the Sunday evenings the public houses; and if any person not belonging to the family was found there, he was subjected to a fine, or, if he could not give an account of himfelf, perhaps to imprisonment. Yet means were found by all who had a mind to evade the laws of fobriety in the following manner: They called at an elder's house, on pretence of feeking the benefit of his prayers or family worthip. This duty being over, the elder put up his bible on an adjoining shelf, and took down a bowl in which he made a finall quantity of punch, prefenting at the fame time fomething to eat, as ham, oat-cake, cheefe, dried fifh. &c. which they call a relift. The elder's bowl being foon exhaufted, each of the guests, in his turn, infilted on having also his bowl; for which demands the landlord took care beforehand to be well provided with rum and other ingredients, which he retailed in this private manner, chiding his gueffs at the fame time that he drank glass for glass, for their intemperance. The company parted at a late hour fufficiently replenished, it must be owned, with the spirit."

The elders or fenators in the Kirk of Scotland, Captain Newte was informed, are a kind of lay-brethren corresponding to the Mahometan Maraboots, who are raised to a degree of clerical dignity, without any previous education or examination, on account of their sanctity, which, it seems, is as often pretended as real.

From Glafgow our travellers ride along the green banks of the Clyde, R 2 adorned

The European Magazine. THE LONDON REVIEW.

adorned with many delightful villas and enlivened by flourishing manufactures, and commerce to Dunbarton, the prospect from which is grand, beautiful, and rich beyond expression; Luss the seat of the Clan Colquhoun, and Loch-Lomond. Here we enter the Highlands, and here commences the Third Division of this wide excursion.

124

[ To be continued. ]

